Dear RVH. Apparently you missed the issue in which I showed that Jesus did not raise himself. He was raised by another, by God, as is clearly proven by Gal. 1:1, Acts 3:15, 4:10, 13:30, 2:32, 5:30, Rom. 10:9, and other verses. In view of the fact that Jesus never raised himself, there is nothing that makes Christ's resurrection any more miraculous than the others. With Jesus, as with other biblical figures, the resurrectee did not resurrect himself. All of the biblical resurrections have this assistance trait in common. So your Christian friends have no reason to say the resurrection of Jesus "is so important."

Letter #648 from TB of Arton, Alabama

Dear Dennis. A truly outstanding job you're doing with BE.... This note is to question something you said in BE issue #149, in response to letter #611. I agree with the writer that "perfect" necessarily includes immunity to being damaged or soiled. If not, why not? Wouldn't it be silly to suggest that a perfect being could be injured? You told the writer that it is "a repudiation of the very definition of God" to say that he, as a perfect being, could produce something that is imperfect. How's that? Wouldn't perfection include omnipotence, and if so, why couldn't he produce anything he liked, even something imperfect? To say that he could not do so implies a limitation which, even if self-imposed, is not compatible with omnipotence.

Do you agree that omnipotence is a logical impossibility, as demonstrated by the "making of a rock too heavy to lift" problem? Wouldn't omnipotence, if it existed, include omnipresence, omniscience? And wouldn't omnipotence preclude omnibenevolence, since omnipotence must include all evil as well as all good? Keep up the great work.

Editor's Response to Letter #648

Dear TB. Be careful or you'll drown in "omnis." First, I don't see why it would be silly under your definition of an omnipotent being to suggest that he could be injured. If you are saying God can't injure himself, then you are saying he isn't omnipotent. There is something he can't do. He can't injure himself. But you just said he was omnipotent. Second, yes, I said that it would be "a repudiation of the very definition of God" to say that he could produce something that is imperfect." You still haven't shown me how that which is perfect can do that which is imperfect and still be called perfect. People who believe in an omnipotent being just don't realize that they are tying themselves in knots. They think that they need only say God can do anything and that settles everything. How wrong they are! It isn't that simple. Because of how God is defined, he is plagued by two major restrictions. He can't do that which repudiates his own character. He can't lie, sin, or engage in any act that is the very antithesis of his being, because the minute he did, he would no longer be God. One of his key characteristics is perfection. By definition everything he does is perfect and for him to commit an imperfect act would be impossible as it would mean he was no longer God. How could that which is perfect do that which is imperfect and still be called perfect. The answer is simple--it can't. In addition, God can't violate the most basic law of logical thought--the law of non-contradiction. He can't create a being more powerful than himself; he can't create something too heavy for him to lift; he can't create a square circle, a two sided triangle, or an all black white horse; he can't count beyond infinity; he can't abolish himself and then bring himself back into existence or engage in other acts that are beyond the pale. This list can be extended longer than most people realize and arises from the fact that theists have not taken account of the logical implications generated by their own definition of God.

You say, "Wouldn't perfection include omnipotence, and if so, why couldn't he produce anything he liked, even something imperfect?" You also say, "To say that he could not do so implies a limitation which, even if self-imposed, is not compatible with omnipotence." Unfortunately the conclusions you draw from both points are incorrect. Omnipotence does not include the ability to violate the law of non-contradiction. You can't be perfect and imperfect simultaneously. You are either one or the other but you can't be both. The basic flaw in your line of reasoning is that you have extended "omnipotence" to include the ability to do anything whatever, even when it repudiates the very definition of God and entails committing two diametrically opposed acts simultaneously. The problems confronting theists, such as those we have already mentioned, are far more potent than biblicists care to admit. They can't be shrugged off with cute remarks and unaffected demeanors. Religionists have always tried to sluff off these queries as nothing more than childish mind games when, in fact, they are dilemmas of the first magnitude that strike at the very core of any beliefs in an omnipotent being. The very foundation of logic itself, the law of non-contradiction, is brought into a direct clash with the ultimate in absolutist claims and hyperbole. Biblicists erroneously think the word "omnipotence" takes care of everything when, in fact, the opposite is true. It's not a screen deterring all barbs, because of the fundamental limitations associated with omnipotence itself.

Your final paragraph seems to agree with the point I'm making, so I see no reason to comment.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #649 from GN of Scottsdale, Arizona

Dear Dennis. I was going through all my notes recently and came across a few things that I thought you might be interested in. Perhaps you know all of this, but just in case you missed something I want to share some of the things I found. Someday you might want to enlarge your encyclopedia and would need more information. I doubt that a book could be big enough to hold all the inconsistencies, false prophecies, lies, distortions, mistakes, and contradictions found in the "book."

First Kings 3:12 says that God gave Solomon a wise and discerning heart so that there has been "NO ONE like you before you nor shall one like you arise after you." No one obviously includes Jesus himself.

Gen. 3:14 says, "Cursed are you (the serpent) more than all cattle." When were the cattle cursed? I thought the creation of animals was "very good." The bible says nothing about when and why cattle were cursed. Perhaps there were talking cows that got themselves in trouble before the serpent.

Ex. 7:22 How did the Egyptian priests turn the water into blood when it was already blood.

Lev. 20:10 Adultery is punishable by death. Why were David and Bathsheba spared?

Lev. 20:27 Mediums and spiritists were to be put to death. Was not Jesus communicating with the dead when Moses and Elijah appeared at the transfiguration, and wasn't Paul talking to the dead when he spoke to Jesus?

Num. 13:33*"the sons of Anak are part of the Nephilim."* The Nephilim should have been destroyed during the flood of Noah's day. How did they show up later?

Editor's Response to Letter #649

If I am not mistaken, GN, we discussed your points with reference to 1 Kings 3:12, Ex. 7:22, and Lev. 20:10 a long time ago. I know they're in my notes. As far as the Nephilim are concerned your point is well taken. They were around in Num. 13:33 which was after the Flood, and that conflicts with Gen. 6:4 which says there were Nephilim before the Flood and Gen. 7:21 which says all living creatures except Noah and his kin died in the Flood. Unless Nephilim were on the ark, biblicists have a problem.

Letter #650 from JK of Lynn, Indiana

Sir.... Thank you for having the gumption to expose all the fallacious writings of that con artists' special, the great lie book, the so-called Bible. I like the Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy very much. Very informative and to the point. But in my estimation there is one flaw. The book is too big. It should be the size that could be carried in the pocket of your coat or jacket. Then if you happened to meet one of those ignorant, superstitious Jesus freaks, you could then have the means to set him straight then and there. Using the same tactics, like quoting from your own source of information, and using their own material to show them their erroneous beliefs.

And now a personal request. I would like to copy BE, maybe a quote or a paragraph in some of my writings, maybe even a half page or so. Of course, the source would be acknowledged.

Editor's Response to Letter #650

Dear JK. Creating a small pocket-size edition of the Encyclopedia is a good idea but, instead, I'd prefer to transform my 5 large notebooks into a portable, small, indexed, data base for quick reference during on-the-spot encounters. But, as always, time and money are the limiting factors. As far as quoting our literature is concerned, that is always permissible as long as people are told the source. In fact, we would encourage you to quote our material at every opportunity.

Letter #651 from DS of Tiffin, Ohio

Dear Dennis. I have stumbled on an idea which may make even an ardent inerrantist take pause. Granted this is probably not a new idea, but one I just thought of, so it's new to me. If the "problems" in the text of the Bible are either translational or "copy errors," then the position of inerrancy is instantly destroyed. As you have stated many times, "it (the Bible) is purported to be the direct and inspired word of God. And God is a perfect, all knowing, and powerful entity." So it follows that if there is even one "copyist error" God was not in charge. If God was not correcting the poor schmuck who was making a particular copy, it proves that it is not God's word. So far, in reading your publication, every apologist has used the mistranslation or copy error argument at least once. They have unwittingly admitted that there is a mistake. The question is begged, "how can an omniscient, omnipotent, and omnipresent being, allow his words to be screwed up? Doesn't it care that this will misrepresent it and wouldn't it have done everything to correct this problem? Even the apologists are admitting that there are these types of errors. Are they admitting that God didn't take charge? If God can cover the world with water, bring it all about in 6 days and do all sorts of great stuff, surely he could have controlled the thoughts of those working on his word. But apparently he did not. Once any error is substantiated it eliminates the book from being the word of a perfect being, regardless of how poor the human aspect would have been. God is supposed to control everything. If he doesn't, prayer would be more pointless than it already is. The sequence of thought would be: 1) God is perfect 2) God controls his created world 3) man is part of that world 4) God controls man 5) under God's control his word would be perfect 6) mistakes are noted 7) the Bible is not God's word. Why even discuss chapter and verse if the apologists are ready to confirm such mistakes. As you have stated, a perfect being could not make an imperfect anything. Just a thought.... As always, keep up the great work.

Letter #652 from LWC of Lufkin, Texas

Dear Dennis. This letter is intended for FVH of Flagstaff, Arizona. In BE #154 he expressed a need for information useful in confronting letter-to-the-editor writing Bible thumpers. While I am sure he will discover many valuable bible bashing gems in BE, I would like to volunteer some more. You see, FVH, at one time I was in the same predicament as you now are. I began to research the problem, and over the years I have succeeded in accumulating much ammunition, some of it downright deadly, to be used in effectively confronting bible fundamentalists. It is my earnest desire to share this information with other freethinkers. So if you will write me (102 Spyglass Drive, Lufkin, Texas 75901 or call me at 409-637-1026 I will be happy to provide this information to you at no cost.

Editor's Response to Letter #652

Dear LWC. We included your letter because you appear to be eager to help those opposing religious propaganda in the print media. But readers should know that we have not seen any of what you have to offer and are in no position to provide an endorsement.

EDITOR'S NOTE:* We are still looking for people willing to play our cable access TV tapes in their vicinity and would like to hear about the experiences of those who have already had some aired. Please keep in mind that our programs are created for, and directed to, believers in an inerrant Bible, not freethinkers. Preaching to the choir or providing confirmation and amusement to our supporters is of secondary importance. Tickling funny bones may be the outcome, but that's not the in-tent. Our objective is to inform, not perform.

COMMENTARY

Many months ago someone sent us a newsletter published by the Secular Humanist Society of New York entitled "Pique." I was bothered by an article on page 2 written by someone named George Rowell entitled "Can secular humanists carry on a dialogue with religionists?" He states:

First we must ask, 'What is the purpose of a dialogue?' If it is a Socratic dialog, the object is to arrive at an agreed-on truth. Now, how do we maintain a dialogue with Christian or Jewish believers who maintain that they already have 'Revealed Truth?' They may have a house full of electronic equipment and even be scientifically literate but still deny the ultimate truth of the scientific method and world view that brought them the equipment.

As we approach the personal plane, any dialog becomes more and more impossible. There is the Christian dogma of original sin, strange archaic beliefs about mystical places called heaven and hell. All of these beliefs and other religious pathologies deny the worth of the individual, or of the bases of secular humanism.

I say that it is impossible to have a meaningful dialog with any people who already claim to have the 'Revealed Truth,' who hypocritically share the benefits of the scientific revolution but deny its ultimate validity, and deny and denigrate the worth of the individual. Who would benefit from such a dialog? Not us or them. We should forget the whole idea. A dialog is a waste of time, energy, and breath.

With whom should we have a dialog, then? The religious doubters of course. There are many we know, but they are unorganized. We should say, 'You have the right to doubt,' and show them why.'

Rowell concluded his article with the following appeal. "What do you think? There are secular humanists who believe in the idea of a dialog. We want to know what you think. We'll print as many responses as we can in this column."

In the next issue a reader wrote in response, "I am in complete agreement with George Rowell's contention that it is futile to engage in 'dialog' with religious fundamentalists. If there is one thing clear about 'God's people' it is that they are convinced that they have a monopoly on truth and virtue, and that anyone with a point of view at variance with their own is inherently depraved and debased. In other words, these folks are convinced that they have all the answers, and that a questioning mind leads directly to eternal torment. We humanists, on the other hand, revel in the uncertainty and mystery of existence and are more inclined to seek new questions, rather than dwell on 'eternal verities'. This is in harmony with the scientific point of view, which is the mortal enemy of all religious thinking and which has pushed human horizons to the very edge of the Universe....I have learned to ignore these people and I have no interest in a 'dialogue' with any of them. Many of them would have burned us at the stake if they had the chance."

Rowell wrote another article in the Fall 1993 Free Inquiry magazine entitled "The Sunday Regression Service" and concluded it with, "...atheists and secular humanists should make a sharp shift in focus of our attacks on religion. We are wasting our time focusing on biblical contradictions and irrationalities. Most Christians have been effectively anesthetized against criticism of this nature. We should instead focus our attention on the psychological manipulations, deceptions, and sleight-of-hand that have made Christianity the longest running shell game in the West. The institutionalized regression of regular church services is a prime example of this pathology."

This last article was sent to us by a reader who said, "While I do not agree that focusing on biblical contradictions and irrationalities are a waste of time (I have read every issue of BE and learned much from your publication) Rowell, nevertheless, may have a good idea. Christian ideologues are masters of deceit... When time and space allow, you may wish to explore some of Rowell's suggestions...." Based upon the contents of this newsletter for the last 13 years, it should come as no surprise to anyone that I am in profound disagreement with parts of Rowell's analysis for many reasons.

First*, I have never been to an atheist, humanist or similar freethought gathering in my life in which a majority of the participants did not come from some sort of religious background. It seems fair to conclude that if they can work their way up and out of religion, so can others. Rowell is assuming that the opposite of a key fundamentalist belief is true. Instead of once saved always saved, it becomes, once lost always lost. Sorry! But I don't think the evidence bears that out for many people. Yes, they are lost if nothing and no one does anything to save them; they are lost if they never hear a discouraging word or data to the contrary; they are lost if the conditions which caused them to accept fundamentalism in the first place are not sufficiently altered; they are lost if they are incapable of even the most elementary critical thought, and they are lost if they have material reasons for staying where they are. But that doesn't apply to many people. Are we just going to throw all of them into one big basket and write them off as a hopeless mass of brainwashed dupes?

Second*, an essential element of Rowell's argument is antidemocratic. What is the alternative to argumentation, evidence, and persuasion, if not physical confrontation and force. Would Rowell advocate the same philosophy in the realm of politics. The right wing of the republican party is dominated by religious fundamentalists. Would he also say it is a waste of time to debate and argue with people like Gingrich, Gramm, and Buchanan. If so, then why have a Congress? Why meet and discuss anything with people of this caliber? After all, their minds are as firmly fixed in the political realm as those of their supporters are in the religious realm. The political right is almost an overlay of the religious right. If it is absurd to debate in the religious arena, then it is no less absurd to clash in the political arena or the economic arena, for that matter. Rowell's approach appears to be one of either leaving or ignoring the problem. Too bad it's not that simple. Or maybe he just thinks we ought to slug it out physically. Biblicists are working like beavers night and day with tremendous wealth and sizable numbers to get their agenda passed, and if Rowell thinks they are going to leave him alone, then he is ensconced in fantasyland.

Rowell says "that it is impossible to have a meaningful dialog with any people who already claim to have the 'Revealed Truth'" when I debate with fundamentalists of every stripe on a daily basis. I strongly suggest he read the Dialogue and Debate sections of this newsletter (over 13 years of interaction), and then tell me it is impossible to have a dialogue. He says, "Who would benefit from such a dialog? Not us or them. We should forget the whole idea. A dialog is a waste of time, energy, and breath." I couldn't disagree more. He's assuming: Once programmed, always programmed. Hasn't he ever heard of deprogramming? If he's repeatedly failing to dissuade people from views they have held for 30 years in 30 minutes, then I can understand his frustration and disillusionment. But that's not how it's done. Dissuasion is not only nearly always more taxing and time-consuming than the original indoctrination but almost always requires multiple encounters.

Third, Rowell says, "What is the purpose of a dialogue? If it is a Socratic dialogue, the object is to arrive at an agreed-on truth." If that's the object of a Socratic dialogue, then we'd better pursue a different dialogue, because that's not my purpose. My initial objective is considerably more fundamental than that. Before you can eat eggs, you must crack shells. Before any-one is going to accept what you have to offer, they must first be convinced of the error of their ways. And that entails penetrating their outer screen. Why would biblicists accept anything you have to offer unless and until they have been shown what is wrong with what they already have. So the initial thrust should not be toward reaching an "agreed-on truth" but toward shaking their resolve and lessening their adherence to what they already believe. I am not nearly as concerned with reaching an agreed upon truth as causing biblicists to loose faith in what they already have. Once their confidence in that which they hold most dear is cracked or shattered, they are far more inclined to look around for alternatives and become amenable to suggestions. Getting them to agree with me in the earliest stages is of far less importance than causing them to think, criticize, question, and reject that which they already have.

Fourth, Rowell states that, "As we approach the personal plane, any dialog becomes more and more impossible." He'd do well to rewrite this sentence since the word "impossible" admits of no gradations. He's becoming impaled on one of those absolutist terms that destroy so much of the Bible's credibility. Wisdom would suggest that the word "impossible" be replaced by the word "difficult."

Fifth, Rowell states, "Who would benefit from such a dialog? A dialog is a waste of time, energy, and breath." Again I must disagree. Everyone involved in discussions of this sort is effected to one degree or another. Be it ever so slight, modifications in outlook are all but impossible to avoid.

Sixth, Rowell continues, "With whom should we have a dialog, then? The religious doubters of course. There are many we know, but they are unorganized. We should say, 'You have the right to doubt, and show them why.'" So, he only wants to debate those who already have doubts. That's like telling people I am not going to teach you biology, French, algebra, or history unless you are already inclined to accept those disciplines. I'm not going to teach you to play tennis or swim, unless you're already interested in activities of that nature. After all, unless you have already shown yourself to be inclined in those directions, there is no sense in me wasting my time. There is no value to be gained by me trying to channel you along those lines.

Seventh, the reader who wrote in sympathy with Rowell says, "I have learned to ignore these people and I have no interest in a 'dialogue' with any of them." Now who's being narrow-minded? I've heard that same comment on several occasions from fundamentalists denouncing freethinkers.

Eighth, in his Fall 1993 article Rowell stated, "We are wasting our time focusing on biblical contradictions and irrationalities." What does he suggest as a substitute: Glittering generalities, nebulous theological debates, extensive listings of biblical atrocities and immoralities, disputed historical contentions, or vague philosophizing on the nature of man's condition and the existence of some sort of divine being concerned with our welfare? Perhaps he prefers arguments based on opinions and imprecise theorizing which unfortunately are not only easy to restructure as conditions dictate but nearly impossible to pin down. Any freethinker who can't devise arguments that are simple, concrete, demonstrable, and important, can all but forget about influencing even the most unsophisticated of biblicists. If Rowell thinks apologists are going to concede points he takes for granted out of the goodness of their hearts, then he's only exposing his degree of detachment from reality. They aren't going to grant him anything and unless he can come up with something that is so obvious, so demonstrable, so clear-cut, so undeniable that even a child can follow the discussion, he has embarked upon a journey to nowhere. Fortunately freethinkers have a tremendous ally in this regard--one of the Bible's greatest weaknesses--it's tangibility, it's condition of being written. In many ways it's set in concrete--an incredibly vulnerable position from the freethinker's point of view. Any lawyer worth his degree will tell you: Get it in writing. When the other guy commits himself to print, he has really stuck his neck out. And just as lawyers go over contracts with a fine tooth comb, freethinkers should peruse the Bible with equal concentration. No other document or stream of argumentation in the United States puts more religious people in a straight-jacket than the Bible.

Ninth, Rowell says, "Most Christians have been effectively anesthetized against criticism of this nature. We should instead focus our attention on the psychological manipulations, deceptions, and sleight-of-hand that have made Christianity the longest running shell game in the West." As a practical matter, what does that mean. In real terms what is he saying? I'd be interested in seeing some of these manipulations, deceptions, and sleight-of-hand tricks that readily lend themselves to rebuttals and exposure with such overpowering impact that thousands of people will be influenced.

The problem is not that people "have been effectively anesthetized against criticism of this nature" but that they have been hearing almost nothing about all of the problems associated with Scripture. Freethinkers have been doing very little in regard to studying the Bible or exposing the flaws contained therein. The American people have been continually subjected to uncorrected and unhindered religious domination of the media and unbridled religious propaganda of this nature can only inure to their detriment. Sunday schools are another element of society that are notoriously one-sided. There has been almost no countervailing voice or contradictory data. And anything to which people aren't exposed, they aren't going to get. If Rowell thinks people who have no access to countervailing views are going to change, then he is even more naive than I thought.

And lastly, Rowell concluded his Pique article with the following appeal. "...There are secular humanists who believe in the idea of a dialog. We want to know what you think." In light of what he has already stated, the implication underlying this comment is that he believes in dialogue only with those who already doubt. If that's humanism then, perhaps, I should reassess my position vis a vis humanism or view the word "humanism" in a different light. There is an element of close-mindedness on his part that I find just as revolting as that which is so endemic to religious fundamentalism. One is as bad as the other. Unfortunately, one of the saddest discoveries I have made over the years is that fundamentalists do not have a corner on the market when it comes to crackpotism. Some of those who have left religion in general and the Bible in particular have adopted philosophies that are almost as preposterous as that which they jettisoned. My philosophy, on the other hand, is quite simple. I'll converse or debate with anyone having sufficient courage or foolishness to show up. I don't prejudge the outcome, assume that which is yet to be proven, insist on unreasonable ground rules, or decline interaction without prior assurances. My biggest problem is just getting people to appear or return to the fray on a repeated basis. I am certainly not going to avoid anyone who is so naive as to try to defend religion in general or the Bible and Jesus in particular. As I have said several times. When those with revealed truth appear at my door they are invited in and the entry is sealed. As far as I am concerned they are not only poor lost souls who have been brought to my home for salvation from mythology, folklore, and superstition but benighted sojourners who may never again have another opportunity to hear the Word exposed for the fraud that it is.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #653 from JB of Ft. Lauderdale Florida (Part a)

Dear Dennis. I wanted to respond to some of the things in your commentary about the Resurrection of Christ. You've probably had many responses from people like myself, so if I am repetitious, just ignore it. While the scriptures do record several "resurrections," none of them have the importance and significance to that of Christ's. You correctly noted Paul's statement that if He be not raised, his preaching is in vain, as is our faith, and we are dead in our sins. I don't think we can say that about the others who were resurrected. Jesus, as God the Son, had the unique qualifications to do what no other mortal could. Also, most of those raised from the dead, died again. Only Enoch and Elijah did not die a natural death. Neither will those believers who are alive when the "rapture" happens (1 Thess. 4:16, 17; 1 Cor. 15: 51-53). While it isn't always clear, it seems that these resurrections were for the glory of God who was behind all of them.

Editor's Response to Letter #653 (Part a)

Dear JB. Unfortunately, you are being repetitious. I really wish you had read the relevant back issues of BE on this topic. First, you say that none of the prior resurrections "have the importance and significance" of Christ's. All you have done is make a statement while providing no proof. How is his resurrection more significant or more important than those of others? Second, you say you "don't think we can say that about the others who were resurrected." Why not? Again no evidence is provided. All you have done is express an opinion based upon Paul's opinion. But even more importantly, you have subtly shifted our focus. My original question was why the resurrection of Jesus would be of any consequence when others rose from the dead before him. I said it should have been met by a resounding yawn followed by "So what else can you do?" Instead of focusing on the resurrection itself you have chosen to emphasize the supposed results that emanated from that event. But that's not the issue. I asked why it was so different as to merit special consideration. What did Jesus do that was different? All you are saying is that it was different and that's why it merits special consideration. But again I ask: Why was it so different as to be important? Your strategy is very analogous to the technique employed by apologists when they are asked how God can be just when he punishes mankind for what Adam did. Instead of answering the question they enter into a lengthy discussion of how God's justice is demonstrated by the fact that he allowed Jesus to provide us with an avenue by which to escape this dilemma. But that's not the issue. If God were really just, he would never have punished us for Adam's misdeed to begin with. We should never have been in the predicament from the beginning. With respect to the resurrection of Jesus, the question is how his was different from those that preceded it, not that it is important because it was different. Apologists are notorious for assuming the very point at issue and then proceeding from there. Third you say Jesus "had the unique qualifications to do what no other mortal could." What qualifications? What are you talking about? And what is it he did that no other mortal could do or did? Stop making statements without proving anything. You are not preaching to the choir and I have no intention of blindly accepting anything you say without evidence and corroboration. Fourth, you have also repeated that worn out defense that "most of those raised from the dead, died again." Where is that stated in scripture? How do you know they died again? How do you know that they did not go straight to heaven like Elijah in his chariot? And, even more importantly, as I have also stated before, that's not the issue. Paul said it's the Resurrection that counts, not the fact that Jesus never died again. Where are you getting this in scripture. Instead of twisting the Bible into whatever strikes your fancy, perhaps you need to write your own version and send me a copy which we could then discuss. Fifth, you state, "Only Enoch and Elijah did not die a natural death." Where does scripture say they died at all? You are making an assumption for which I see no biblical support. All scripture says is that "Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven" (2 Kings 2:11) and "Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him" (Gen. 5:24). Where does it say they died, naturally or otherwise? Sixth, you dragged in a reference to the alleged Rapture for reasons I am yet to discern. Not only is it immaterial to the point you are trying to make, but, if anything, it proves the opposite by citing examples of people who, like Jesus, never died again. In fact, they never will die to start with, if your rapture theory has any merit. I think you are so enwrapped by the Rapture that you all but wrapped up any validity to your argument. This topic was so juicy from your perspective that you couldn't resist bringing it into the discussion, even at personal cost. And finally, you say, "While it isn't always clear, it seems that these resurrections were for the glory of God who was behind all of them." "It isn't always clear!" is an understatement if there ever was one. How true! It's not clear. So why bring it up? Even if it were clear, what difference would that make and how does it bear on the topic at hand?

Letter #653 Concludes (Part b)

I can promise you one thing. If I had a child who met with a tragic or untimely death, I would be grieved like never before. I don't think I would "yawn" if that child were restored to life. And it is clear that nobody "yawned" when Jesus was resurrected. A little unbelief, yes, but no yawning. While the scriptures do record several resurrections, they were minuscule in comparison to those who were not raised back to life. So I don't think you can say that this sort of thing was "commonplace."

Imagine this. If Christ is not raised from the dead, the greatest hoax of all time has been played on untold "billions" of people. I say billions because the resurrection was taught as a doctrine in the OT as well as the New (Gen. 22:5; Job 14:14; 19:25-26; Psalm 49:15; Isaiah 26:19; Hosea 13:14; Daniel 12:2). OT believers in the Messiah had faith that they would be raised from the dead to live in the presence of God forever.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #653 (Part b)

Let's don't try to play the emotional card, JB. We are comparing resurrections, and as far as the difference between the resurrection of Jesus and those of others is concerned, it should be met with a yawn. We are not discussing deaths but their opposites, resurrections from death. Obviously, on a personal level the death and resurrection of a close relative, like a child, would almost never be met with a yawn. But who said anything about deaths? The issue is resurrections from death, not deaths themselves or to whom they occur. Second, how do you know that "it is clear that nobody yawned when Jesus was resurrected." Were you there or is that in scripture somewhere? Where are you getting all these conclusions, summations, and conjectures you periodically throw around with thoughtless abandon. Third, you say, "While the scriptures do record several resurrections, they were minuscule in comparison to those who were not raised back to life." This is more than repetitious and non substantive; it's incoherent. It sounds as if you are comparing resurrections to other resurrections in which people are not raised to life. If they weren't raised back to life, how could they experienced resurrections? What are you talking about?. Fourth, you state, "So I don't think you can say that this sort of thing was 'commonplace'." To what is "this sort of thing" referring? Resurrections? But we have proved that they were sufficiently common in biblical times to warrant asking how the resurrection of Jesus was different from all those that preceded it, and, thus, why it could not be considered commonplace. And lastly, except for the words "in Messiah" I have no particular objection to the contents of your last paragraph but its contribution to your argument eludes me. You seem to have great difficulty staying focused on the topic at hand and are possessed by a pronounced tendency to tour "tangent trail."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #654 from DJ of Standard, California

Dear Scholar. Your Bible Errancy Commentary which we saw on a local public access to cable TV here in Sonora was great. Please send me information.

Editor's Response to Letter #654

Dear DJ. We would not only like to thank you for your compliment but especially thank those responsible for the program being aired in California. If only more people were willing to assist our cause! It's nice to know that we are now being seen on the West coast.

Letter #655 from DH of Lebanon, Oregon

Dear Mr. McKinsey. Thank you for sending, at my request, the sample issue of your fine publication. You are doing a great service. Count me as a subscriber.... I am a longtime freethinker who, in my early youth, had sights set upon the ministry. Fortunately, I came to my senses before I'd gone too far down that road. You would be interested to learn, however, what the dean of an Episcopal cathedral said to me when I was in college. I told the dean that I was thinking of not pursuing a clerical career because I honestly didn't believe the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith. How could I do the liturgy, say all the things the priest had to say and simultaneously know in my mind that I didn't believe a word of it. His response was, "You shouldn't worry about that; most of us (other clergy) don't believe it either!" Despite my freethinking point of view, I have always maintained a strong interest in the Bible and have been looking for years for publications like those you produce....

Letter #656 from KH of Greenacres, Washington

Dear Mr. McKinsey. I read and very much enjoyed my daughter's copy of The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy. My memory is fuzzy on your mention of Nazareth but I was surprised that you didn't point out that there wasn't even a town called Nazareth during Jesus' lifetime (though apparently there was a village that was later renamed Nazareth). Perhaps you haven't been exposed to that possibility. In the second paragraph, on page 260 of William Harwood's Mythology's Last Gods he says it was renamed in the 5th century C.E. On page 191 in the 3rd paragraph of Losing Faith in Faith Dan Barker mentions that there's no confirmation of a city named Nazareth before the second century C.E. A third mention (for which I cannot find the reference) was to the effect that the mother of the Roman Emperor Constantine was greatly embarrassed by the non-existence of a town called Nazareth, so she convinced her son to create one. Keep up the good work.

Letter #657 from HK of Randolph, Mass.

Dear Mr. McKinsey. I've been subscribing to BE for the past year, and it's an always interesting, stimulating publication. Thank you. I think you and other BE readers might find the following info of some interest:

The "Christian" "Research" Institute of California does a daily radio broadcast, "The Bible Answer Man", answering questions from callers. (I need hardly add, I suppose, that most callers are quite naive and obviously crave the authoritative assurance the host, Hank Hennagraaff, provides.). One of CRI's arguments "proving" the "truth" of the bible is the claim that "the bible does not contradict itself, and the odds of that happening by chance, with 66 separate books, are so small as to be impossible." I thought it would be interesting to try to learn the source of that calculation, so I wrote CRI a (very sympathetic) letter, specifically asking for the source of the calculation and the name of the publication or article where I could read more about this. Naturally, all I got back was a repetition of the claim--no reference at all to the source of the calculation. That's no surprise.

Another argument these folks use is that the fact that some incidents and places mentioned in the Bible are real "proves" the truth of the bible. By this logic, there are obviously a lot of novels which are "true", since they mention real places, events, and people. Sheesh!!! Don't these people use their brains for anything?? Thanks. Keep up the good work.

Letter #658 from EB of Corpus Christi, Texas

Dear Dennis. At last I got Biblical Errancy Commentary scheduled on the local public access channel. I think I told you each program would be on four times a week. That is no longer the case because so many more programs are playing now than was true several years ago. The program will be on Friday at 2 p.m. and Sunday at 8 p.m. I will leave each program on for two weeks so that more people will have an opportunity to see it. I'm hoping you will get correspondence as a result of these programs.

Editor's Response to Letter #658

Dear EB. Sounds like a viable plan to me and keep up the good work. If you get an opportunity to switch the Friday afternoon program to any evening after seven, I would recommend doing so. By that time most people are home from work and have finished supper. But an afternoon time is certainly better than nothing. When you begin a new program, you sometimes have to go to the end of the line and accept time slots that are less than desirable. We have been fortunate enough to have had the 7 P.M. time slot in our area from the very beginning.

Letter #659 from BC of Seattle, Washington

Hello. Saw your name in The Book the Church Does Not Want You to Read. After 15 years in a cult (Armstrongism) I finally saw through a lot of religion and now have begun to question the King James itself. I never could buy the idea in the Ten Commandments to not make graven images and the same God telling Moses to set up a golden serpent for healing the Israelites. Something's wrong.

Letter #660 from BS of Baton Rouge, Louisiana

Dear Dennis.... I look forward to receiving your back issues, even though it will mean staying up very late at night for the pleasure of finishing them and probably falling asleep at work the next day.

EDITOR'S NOTE:* We're always in need of more people willing to play our cable access TV tapes in their vicinity and we would again like to renew our gratitude to all those who have already had some aired. If you're already involved, by all means write and let us know how events are proceeding.

Although the tapes were primarily created for use on public access cablevision, we are more than glad to send them to those who are merely buying them for their own use and dissemination.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #661 from JB of Ft. Lauderdale, Florida

Dear Dennis. Thanks for sending the sample issue of BE. I have read it carefully and am challenged by your tough questions and sharp analysis of "thorny" matters. I'm sure that you have received all kinds of responses concerning your commentary about the resurrection but I'll throw in my two cents worth anyway....

I will concede that there are many difficulties that may never be explained. And I will agree that there have been numerous transcription errors between the primary versions (KJV, NASB, NIV). The compositors of the KJV acknowledged the enormous task at hand and even recognized there would be some problems. However, I question how upset God might be if the author of Samuel and the author of Chronicles recorded different numbers for the horsemen that David captured. Does this mean the Bible can't be trusted? Well, there are millions of people all around the world whose faith is not shaken over such "inconsistencies." Does this mean the Bible is not Inspired? I don't think so. When we all die, I think the truth will be known.

Anyway, I would like to ask you two questions: (1) Can you estimate how much of the Bible you accept as truth or fact. (2) If every "contradiction, inconsistency, error, etc." could be reconciled to your satisfaction, would you consider accepting Christ as your personal Savior? Again, thanks for sending the information.

Editor's Response to Letter #661

Dear JB. To begin with, I'm not sure what you mean by saying "there have been numerous transcription errors between the primary versions (KJV, NASB, NIV)." Are you saying all of these versions disagree with one another? Or are you saying all of them disagree with the so-called autographs? If the former, then we agree; if the latter, then how do you know. When you ask if God would be upset "if the author of Samuel and the author of Chronicles recorded different numbers for the horsemen that David captured," I must take issue with both the premise and conclusion of that ill-conceived comment. We aren't concerned with how god would view a problem of this nature. We are concerned with what this says about the book in which it appears. It proves the book is not only errant and, thus, fallible, but could in no way be the perfect word of a divine being.

In addition, like so many apologists who realize the existence of biblical contradictions can no longer be denied rationally, you opt for the secondary expedient of belittling their importance and dismissing their impact. In truth, anyone with even a modicum of information regarding BE knows that we have presented hundreds, even thousands, of contradictions of this nature and have never been so foolish as to assume a few mathematical conflicts are sufficient to bring down the Bible. We have chosen the far more rational and potent strategy of simply drowning the book's proponents in an avalanche, a tidal wave, of facts, figures, names, dates, places, conflicts, and contradictions on virtually every conceivable subject discussed by the the Bible. The massive weight of our evidence, its sheer volume, is more than sufficient to awaken all but the most intransigent ideologue to his deluded ways. We would never be so naive as to put all our bombs into one small category. You ask "Does this mean the Bible can't be trusted?" You bet it does. I don't know of any method that could prove it better. Do you? What are you looking for?

Second, you ask "If every contradiction, inconsistency, error, etc. could be reconciled to your satisfaction, would you consider accepting Christ as your personal Savior?" Since there is no chance, whatever, of that happening, let me ask you a far more realistic and practical question. How many contradictions, inconsistencies, inaccuracies, errors and fallacies would I have to present in order to convince you that the Bible is light years from being the perfect word of a divine being? At what point would you be willing to concede that the book does not live up to its billing and is duping its adherents?

Third, as far as how much of the Bible I accept as truth is concerned, so much is fallacious and contradictory, that I have never felt any need for such a fruitless analysis and that isn't even the issue. The question is not how much I think is true but how much is so obviously untrue as to prove it couldn't possibly be divinely inspired.

Fourth, you say "there are millions of people all around the world whose faith is not shaken over such 'inconsistencies'." My friend, whether or not their faith is shaken is irrelevant to the central question of whether or not the Bible is inerrant. We are not conducting a popularity contest, nor are we judging the truth of something on the basis of its following. Millions of people believed in Hitler, but that certainly doesn't mean his teachings were valid. Millions of muslims are devoted to the Koran, but that hardly proves it's God's word.

Fifth, you say "Does this mean the Bible is not Inspired?" You mean does the existence of contradictions and similar problems prove the Bible is not inspired? Well, it's about as good a proof as I know of. Do you know of anything better? What are you looking for? What do you want? When something in Deuteronomy says something in Exodus is false; when something in Chronicles says something in Samuel or Kings is inaccurate; when something in Matthew says something in Luke is erroneous; when Paul disputes Jesus, that's as conclusive a demonstration as you can find. Again I ask, what do you want? Having dealt with this problem for many years, I'm close to concluding that if Jesus, himself, appeared and said it was all a charade, a monumental fraud, created because he just felt people ought to have something to believe in, many of his followers would accuse him of being mistaken and succumbing to some kind of sinister force.

And finally you state "when we all die, I think the truth will be known." That statement is based on the assumption that you are going to continue existing somehow in order to receive the answer--which is itself a belief restricted to faith alone, because certainly no proof is available. If your assumption is as invalid as it is unprovable and you were prescient, you could very well be the one in line for a shock.

Letter #662 from MT of Anaheim, California

Dear Mr. McKinsey. In your book page 343 says that Luke was in error by saying Jesus was born when Quirinius was governor of Syria. I have heard that a Sir Fredrick (sic) Kenya (sic) found evidence that Quirinius was governor of Syria twice, once around 6 BC, the other 4 A.D. Is the true? ("Sic" means the word was misspelled and was left that way--Ed.)

Also, on page 338, you said that Darius the Mede is not mentioned in any ancient document, yet the Ryrie study Bible says the "Nabonidus Chronicle" identified Darius the Mede with a governor named Gubaru (page 1305). I'd like to know what you think about this....

You said on page 336 that history knew nothing of an Assyrian king named Pul. Page 578 of the Ryrie bible says that Pul was "tiger-Pileser III (sic) mentioned in 1 Chron. 5:26. Do you think this is just speculation?....

I also heard a "scholar" say that the walls of Jericho, when escavated (sic), fell down just as Joshua describes. Could you comment on that?

Ryrie says on page 9 of his study Bible that the word in Gen. 1:28 translated "replenish" should actually be translated as "fill," and cannot be used to support a pre-Adamic race. Yet, in your book you said the word was "replenish" and in this particular passage implied a repopulation of the earth. Could you comment on that?

If you could answer any of these, that would be great. I have been subscribing to your newsletter for (I believe) half a year now. I was a Jehovah's Witness, then a fundamentalist Christian. Any information would be helpful.

Editor's Response to Letter #662

Dear MT. Scholars can say anything they like and often do. That, along with the fact that none of us were there and we're forced to rely upon the historian we prefer, is why I have never put much stock in the historical approach to biblical refutation. As far as your individual points are concerned, let's take them one at a time.

First, you say that you heard "that a Sir Fredrick (sic) Kenya (sic) found evidence that Quirinius was governor of Syria twice, once around 6 BC, the other 4 A.D." "You have heard" is rather vague. Whom did you hear it from and did this source provide some evidence? People can say he was governor as many times as they want, but the question is whether or not they can prove it. Virtually no one denies he was governor once. But your source is obligated to prove additional mandates.

Second, you say the "Ryrie Study Bible says the 'Nabonidus Chronicle' identified Darius the Mede with a governor named Gubaru." Have you seen this Chronicle or are you just taking the word of an avowed apologist. Biblicists are notorious for playing the switch-or-duplicate name game and this could very well be a good example of same. The burden of proof is on Ryrie because he is asserting that two completely different names are of the same person. This also applies to the Assyrian king named Pul being the "tiger-Pileser III (sic) mentioned in Chronicles.

Third, for thousands of years some scholars have been saying the walls of Jericho fell down as the Bible relates. That's not surprising, but keep in mind that they are obligated to provide tangible evidence of same. Until archeology or a related discipline furnishes something of real substance, you are under no obligation to accept their account. Have you seen their excavation data? Was it subjected to independent verification and analysis? Have you had access to and studied the records and documentation of those who refute this story? Or are you just taking the apologists' word for it?

Fourth and lastly, you say that "the word in Gen. 1:28 translated 'replenish' should actually be translated as 'fill,' and cannot be used to support a pre-Adamic race" according to Ryrie. Then Ryrie is saying he knows Hebrew better than the groups of scholars that translated the King James and the American Standard versions, both of which say "replenish." Also, Ryrie is tied in a knot by the same statement in Gen. 9:1 which says "replenish" or "repopulate" not only in the KJV and the ASV but the Jewish Masoretic Text and the Living Bible as well. There's a big difference between "replenish" and "fill." The apologetic argument that the KJV is out-of-date simply won't stand the strain in light of the fact that relatively recent translations such as The Living Bible and the American Standard Version say the same.

Remember above all else that the Bible is a political book that is changed, increased, diminished and rewritten as conditions dictate. Anytime you open any version of the Bible, first notice how key words are translated. Does it use "young woman" or "virgin" in Isaiah 7:14? Is the Hebrew word translated as "kill" or "murder" in the 6th commandment (Ex. 20:13)? How extravagant is the number in 1 Sam. 6:19? Is "without a cause" inserted into Matt. 5:22 and the word "yet" into John 7:8? Has the word "openly" been removed from Matt. 6:6? Does Matt. 19:9 omit "whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery?" Does 2 Tim 3:16 say "all scripture is inspired" or does it say "all scripture that is inspired?" Does 2 Peter 1:1 say "of God and our Savior Jesus Christ" or does it say "of our God and Savior Jesus Christ"? And how does 1 Tim 6:10 handle money as a source of evil? These may seem like lesser matters to some, but they are of critical importance to those who really study scripture. You can nearly always tell a book's liberal or conservative slant by observing these key junctures. More often than not you can even tell the degree of conservatism or liberalism in the book's authors. They all have an agenda and it's just a matter of finding where they are trying to lead you. If you think versions of the Bible are put together by objective, dispassionate, neutral, unbiased scholars, I strongly recommend reconsideration of your position. If you have a version that you deem to be neutral, by all means send me a copy. I await its arrival with bated breath. But be prepared to hear about the error of your ways.

Letter #663 from NB of Tucson, Arizona (Part a)

(On page 4 in the 148th issue we noted that the Bible erred when it said the bat is a bird in Lev. 11:13, 19. Rev. BB attacked this as a translation difficulty caused by the KJV, but we noted that the NASB, the NB, the ASV and other versions have the same words. In agreeing with Rev. BB, NB says, "I have a few comments regarding BE #148. First, in discussing Letter #605 you say: "the terminology of the NASB, the NEB, the ASV and 'other' versions is no different from that of the KJV." I beg to differ. You didn't mention the NIV, but I assume you read it.

In response to NB I said, "Dear NB. I said the NASB, the NEB, the ASV and other versions are in agreement with the KJV. I didn't say that included every version on the market. Exhibiting a noticeable degree of imprudence, NB now wishes to resume the encounter.-- ED.)

Dear Dennis. I see that after ignoring several of my previous letters and a delay of several months, you finally got around to commenting on one of my letters (#639 in the Nov. 1995 issue which is 155). It isn't clear from your reply whether or not you read the NIV regarding Lev. 11:13-20, or you might have noted the succinct footnote to Lev. 11:19 in the NIV which says, "The precise identification of some of the birds, insects, and animals in this chapter is uncertain."

Editor's Response to Letter #663 (Part a)

Dear NB. First, you appear to be obsessed with the NIV. Apparently you want me to accept an admittedly imprecise NIV footnote while ignoring the actual text of the NASB, the NEB, and the ASV.

Second and even more importantly, you didn't even read your own footnote very carefully. As you noted it says, "The precise identification of some of the birds, insects, and animals in this chapter is uncertain." But that doesn't mean the identification of every one is uncertain or that the bat, the last animal listed and the one with which we are primarily concerned, has been incorrectly identified. It says the precise identification of some is uncertain. How do you know your footnote applies specifically to the bat in verse 19 and if it doesn't your footnote is immaterial.

Third, what really makes your explanation lamentable is that your own beloved NIV says "bat" in the 19th verse. The version you cite the most undermines your own position. It says "These are the birds you are to detest...." and then lists 19 birds followed by the 20th which is a bat. Why not be more rational and stop trying to defend an obviously indefensible scientific error in the Bible. In the long run you'll feel better and look less silly. You said, "It isn't clear from your re-ply whether or not you read the NIV regarding Lev. 11:13-20, or you might have noted the succinct footnote to Lev. 11:19 in the NIV." I read it years ago. The problem lies not with my failure to read closely or critically but with your failure to read and comprehend. If you had been more observant and less defensive, you would never have walked into this tar baby.

And finally, I never ignored your letters and take exception to the underlying implication. As I said in my November issue, our failure to respond to letters is attributable to the sheer volume of mail we receive rather than any reticence on our part. Delayed responses can only be eliminated by adding pages, costs, and/or time, all of which are unacceptable options.

Letter #663 Continues (Part b)

(In the second part of Letter #639 NB continued to assert that the resurrection of Jesus was unique because there were no OT resurrections prior to his other than possibly that of Elijah raising the son of the widow of Zarephath in 1 Kings 17:22. Yet, I cited 1 Sam. 28:7, 11, 15, 2 Kings 4:32, 34, 35, and 13:21, as other examples of OT resurrections. Continuing his assault NB says--Ed.),

Regarding the OT resurrections, at the time I wrote that letter I had not done enough research, but several months ago I noted the resurrection of the Shunamite by Elisha (2 Kings 4:34-35) and the "miracle at the tomb of Elisha" when a dead man was tossed into the grave of Elisha, and was revived when he touched the bones of Elisha (2 Kings 13:21), but WHO raised him?...

OK. Along with the resurrection of the son of the Widow of Zarephath, that makes three. As to 1 Sam. 28:7-19 that looks for all the world as if the Witch of Endor had conjured up a "vision" for Saul's benefit, and I find it very hard to accept that as a genuine "resurrection."

So that makes 3 (or maybe 4) OT "resurrections" if you don't accept the translations of Enoch and Elijah as "resurrections" (Yes, they never "rose from the dead", but neither did they "taste of death"). So do your "more than 3 resurrections" consist of a grand total of one?

Editor's Response to Letter #663 (Part b)

You started inaccurate NB, proceeded downhill, and concluded incoherent. Following your thought processes puts a strain on mine.

First, I certainly believe your admission that "at the time I wrote that letter I had not done enough research." Unfortunately you still haven't.

Second, you ask "but WHO raised him?" when that isn't even the issue. My original question eons ago was: Why was the resurrection of Jesus so spectacular, when so many people rose from the dead before him. Who raised who isn't even material to my original question, especially in the light of the fact, as I have stated repeatedly, Jesus was raised by someone else, like everyone else.

Third, you admit that the Shunamite, the dead man who touched Elisha, and the widow's son were raised. You dismiss the Witch of Endor as conjuring up nothing more than a "vision" and then say, "So that makes 3 (or maybe four) OT 'resurrections' if you don't accept the translations of Enoch and Elijah as 'resurrections' (Yes, they never 'rose from the dead', but neither did they 'taste of death')." Where on earth are you going with this? You keep admitting more and more resurrections while simultaneously claiming the resurrection of Jesus was sui generis.

Fourth, as I said earlier, you don't read very closely. If you had read my original question with a more discerning eye, you would have noticed that I referred to the numerous resurrections occurring prior to the resurrection of Jesus. I never said they were confined to the OT alone. I mentioned the saints arising in Matt. 27:52-53, Jairus' daughter in Matt. 9:18-25, the widow at Nain's son in Luke 7:11-15, and Lazarus in John 11:43-44. To be perfectly candid. How many resurrections do you want? What are you looking for? Millions?

Fifth, you are back on this Enoch/Elijah thing again with a comment that is not only irrelevant and immaterial but inane. You say, "Yes, they never 'rose from the dead', but neither did they "taste of death". What does that have to do with anything? I have never mentioned them with respect to the resurrection. You, however, seem infatuated with their ascensions.

And lastly, your final comment is jewel of vacuity. After stating what you said in my third point, you say, "So do your 'more than 3 resurrections' consist of a grand total of one?" What on earth does that mean? I would only hope that in the dark cavernous recesses of your deluded mind there is at least a faint glimmer of light associated with this comment because I'm certainly aware of none in mine.

Letter #663 Concludes (Part c)

[The 9th question on our pamphlet entitled THE BIBLE IS GOD'S WORD? asks if Solomon's house contained 2,000 baths (1 Kings 7:26) or 3,000 (2 Chron. 4:4). NB says in response--Ed.],

And the last time I looked, you still hadn't learned that a "bath" (1 Kings 7:26; 2 Chron. 45:5) was an old Hebrew unit of capacity (about 10 gallons), not a "room" as we might think of a "bath." And yes, I'm aware of the fact that 2 Kings says there were "2,000 baths" and 2 Chron. says 3,000. It would take at least a full issue of BE to discuss the vagaries of the Hebrew' crude method (and the many possibilities for error) of writing numbers (using modified letters of the Hebrew alphabet).

Editor's Response to Letter #663 (Part c)

I'm well aware of the fact that a bath is a unit of capacity and not a room, but that is immaterial to the central question. What a bath is or isn't is of far less importance than how many of them are involved. Whether it is a room or a unit of capacity doesn't matter as far as the contradiction is concerned. If it's a room, then you would have contradictory figures with respect to how many rooms there were. If it's a unit of capacity then you have contradictory figures with respect to how many units of capacity there were. Either way defenders of the Bible, such as yourself, are in a quicksand bog. You may be aware of the conflict between 2 Kings and 2 Chron. but you are incapable of understanding its significance.

Secondly, your comment that "It would take at least a full issue of BE to discuss the vagaries of the Hebrew' crude method (and the many possibilities for error) of writing numbers (using modified letters of the Hebrew alphabet)" is nothing more than a ruse, absent evidence to the contrary. Mere utterance doesn't make it so. You're facing two comments that clash and the contradiction stands until you can reconcile the irreconcilable. Apparently I'm supposed to assume that no contradiction exists simply because you allegedly have evidence to the contrary. That's a backhanded way of telling me: Are you going to believe me or your lying eyes. The contradiction is obvious, it's blatant, it's clear, and it's going to stand in the mind of sane men until you come up with something far better than your transparent sophistry. If you really had a plausible reconciliation, I have little doubt that you would reveal some of it. I wish I had recorded every apologist who has told me he has an ideological super bomb lying beneath the table which is only held in check by his sympathy for others and respect for intellectual discourse. The only real bomb involved is your response.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #664 from KB of Los Angeles, California

Dear Dennis. Congratulations on the move for the better! I'll post your new address in the Atheist, Humanist, and Christian sectors of America Online. Also, the new typography is a great improvement.

Some time ago I volunteered my help in getting your programs on Los Angeles area cable TV stations, but I have not heard back. I need to have information as to what format (half - inch VHS, three quarter inch professional type or equivalent) in which you have your programs. If you have them only in the VHS format, then there are very few stations that can broadcast them. Enclosed is a copy of the requirements for American Cablevision that covers the cities of South Pasadena and San Marino, indicating technical requirements.

American Cablevision has an additional requirement not mentioned on the sheet, and that is that there must be a resident of their area that requests that the program be shown. If you have anyone on your mailing list with an address in either South Pasadena or San Marino, please have that person write a letter to the station requesting the program....

Editor's Response to Letter #664

Dear KB. We certainly appreciate any assistance you can render and apologize if we did not reply to your letter in due course. I have become incredibly busy in recent years because of the added burden associated with creating and producing TV shows. Technically speaking, all of our programs are recorded on Professional Quality Super VHS 1/2 inch tapes and then copies are made on regular Professional Quality VHS tapes and sent out. You are correct when you say that some stations require tapes be sponsored by someone living in the cable station's audience. Perhaps someone can help us in this regard. It might be better, however, if the people you are seeking contacted me first and I will forward their names and addresses to you for further instructions. As I mentioned in a prior issue, we can send our tapes to you for viewing, but you will have to tailor them for the specific requirements of your area. Cable stations vary too widely in what they want.

Letter #665 from DS of Davenport, Iowa (Part a)

As a long-time subscriber to BE I was delighted that you put much of it together in your book. I sent to Prometheus for it as soon as it was announced and after waiting forever it finally came. One disappointment is that it did not have a dust cover. Dust covers usually have a thumbnail sketch of the author. I would like very much to have a short biography on you Dennis, not long and involved, but similar in nature to what would be on a book jacket. In short what do you do for a living, what is your education, why did you tackle this specific mission and so on.

My own quick bio is that I am a retired skilled worker...and I am devoting my retirement to the promotion of civil liberties. I am a veteran of WW-2 and Korea. One often told pulpit lie is that there are no atheists in foxholes. I submit that a submarine is a reasonable equivalent and I was an atheist when I was riding the boats and still am a half-century later.

Editor's Response to Letter #665 (Part a)

I sent biographical information and a picture of myself to Prometheus but they chose not to include either. I am not sure why, but it was their call to make. In essence, a bio would have stated that I'm 55 years old and have a bachelor's degree in philosophy and master's degree in the social sciences from Indiana University. I attended law school in the 1960's and was in the MBA program for a brief period, neither of which retained my interest. I taught secondary social studies for 9 years and was a secondary guidance counselor for 12 years. During the 1970's and 1980's I was a sociology instructor at a community college, a civil rights investigator and a governmental researcher. I've been married to my only wife for nearly 20 years and my oldest of 3 children is 11.

Having not been reared in a religious environment, let alone a fundamentalist one, I have no ax to grind in that regard. Despite the assumptions of some, "getting it off my chest" in reprisal for a strict fundamentalist upbringing plays no part whatever in my considerations. I have just always had an interest in philosophy and religion. Chess, tennis, non-fiction reading, and writing are my favorite pastimes, although writing has been all-consuming lately.

Letter #665 Continues (Part b)

I was reared as a Christian Scientist and my mother died when I was fourteen, a victim of cancer and Christian Science. Her only treatment for cancer of the uterus was Miss Perkins, a CS practitioner, "working for her."

This caused me to seriously study religion, CS in particular and Christianity in general. My first attempt to study the bible was to start with Genesis and try to read it through. As you've probably guessed I bogged down in the middle of Leviticus and said to hell with it. Later when I was in the navy I got hold of the University of Chicago's American Bible Translation. I used it for study and went through the NT first.... Although I found contradictions by myself, I stumbled on to Thomas Paine's The Age of Reason and was really off and running. I debate local ministers on bible inerrancy and the existence of god on occasion and find your encyclopedia very useful. I have found it most practical to stay away from the subject of atheism and concentrate on the bible.

Editor's Response to Letter #665 (Part b)

You are probably already aware of the fact that the Christian Science denomination is an exceptionally jeopardous outfit that is responsible for the deaths of many through prayer overdose. It may be Christian but it's reliance upon metaphysical mutterings instead of responsible and qualified medical care creates a canyon between it and science. I can't help but recall the recent Twitchell case in which two indoctrinated parents rejected medical assistance for their baby and caused it to die from an easily remedied bowel obstruction. By not being able to evacuate, can you imagine the sheer agony, the torture, that child must have gone through--all because its parents succumbed to absurd biblical teachings and medieval nonsense.

Your evolution away from religious superstition resembles that of many, and I am glad to see that you are using our material in the manner intended. Keep up the good work.

Issue #159 Editor: Dennis McKinsey

Mar. 1996

A national periodical focusing on Biblical errors, contradictions, and fallacies, while providing a hearing for apologists

COMMENTARY

On page 5 in the May, 1995 Issue (#149) we made a comparison between Christianity and Islam that could very well merit reconsideration. In response to a letter from Maryland I said, "Islam is an exceptionally dangerous religion because the Koran actually advocates the eradication of its opponents. With all their faults, New Testament writers never went quite that far." Having reconsidered this issue, it could very well be that NT writers did go that far, depending on how Luke 19:27 and the surrounding verses are interpreted. Specifically, in Luke, Jesus related a parable about a nobleman who went on a trip and left three servants with some money that they were to increase by trading. The first increased his ten pounds and the second increased his five pounds, but the third did not increase his at all. This upset the nobleman after he returned and the following conversation occurs beginning with the third servant speaking at verse (21). "For I feared thee, because thou art an austere man; thou takest up that thou layest not down, and reapest that thou didst not sow. (22) And he (the nobleman--Ed.) saith unto him, Out of thine own mouth I will judge thee, thou wicked ser-vant. Thou knewest that I was an austere man, taking up that I laid not down, and reaping that I did not sow: (23) Wherefore then gavest not thou my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury? (24) And he said unto them that stood by, Take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds. (25) (And they said unto him, Lord, he hath ten pounds.) (26) For I say unto you, That unto every one which hath shall be given; and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away from him. (27) But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring thither, and slay them before me . (28) And when he (Jesus--Ed.) had thus spoken, he went before, ascending up to Jerusalem." The crucial question is: Where do the words of the nobleman end. At what verse does he stop speaking. It is extremely important whether or not the last thing he says is verse 24, 26, or 27 because if Jesus is speaking for himself in verse 27 then he is one of the most intolerant and ruthless figures to have ever emerged from the pages of literature. On the other hand, if these two verses are merely a summation of the situation by the nobleman, the Christian dilemma is lessened dramatically.

Although we have been aware of this problem for many years, it's never been directly discussed because the text has always been viewed as too ambiguous. Is Jesus saying verse 27 or is he merely relating the words of a nobleman in a parable? That's the issue.

Another one of our subscribers GK, wrote an article in the FFRF's Newsletter, Freethought Today, the gist of which was that, "The quote is directly attributable to and about Jesus. Although apologists contend that this is merely a 'quotation within a quotation'... Biblical scholarship demonstrates otherwise." To prove these comments express the attitude of Jesus, he cites several commentaries from Christian sources. GK states that all these commentaries "substantiate my conclusions regarding the muddled verses that clearly portray Jesus insisting 'slay mine enemies at my feet'...." The commentaries he cites to prove verse 27 is not part of the pounds parable are as follows: (1) Dummelow Bible Commentary, N.Y., 1922, page 765, notes that verse 27 has nothing to do with the servants who managed money, but 'describes the final punishment of those who reject Christ.' (2) The International Critical Commentary, 1902, Vol. 27, 5th edition, on page 443, notes. 'St. Augustine more than once points to verse 27 in answer to the objection that the severe God of the OT cannot be identical with the God of Love in the NT. In the Gospels, as in the Law, the severity of God's judgments against willful disobedience is plainly taught....' (3) Cook Commentary of the Holy Bible, 1878, Vol. 1, London, page 440, specifically attributes verse 27 to '...(Jesus) literal coming of the end of the world...,' and is not applicable to the parable's servants' management of their master's pounds. (4) Elliott Bible Commentary, Vol. VI, London, page 338, notes that verse 27 is distinct from the parable of the pounds and 'Spiritually it represents, in bold figures drawn from the acts of tyrant kings, the ultimate victory of JC over the unbelieving and rebellious.' GK concludes by saying, "The above references should adequately demonstrate on which side 'scholarship' comes down on this particular issue." GK's interpretation of verse 27 is certainly in keeping with JC's belligerent comment in Matt. 10:34 ('I come not to bring peace, but to bring a sword').

In the interest of balance, however, it should be noted that some people disagree with GK and their views are aptly stated by the following letter to the Humanist News of Minneapolis-St. Paul. A woman stated, "In the interests of accuracy I would point out that GK has quoted very carelessly. Jesus is telling a story, a parable, and in the parable the king says, 'But as for these enemies of mine, who did not want me to reign over them, bring them here and slay them before me.' Yes, Jesus did say the words, but I believe they must be taken in context. It is very different, to my mind, to say that Jesus wanted his enemies brought before him and slain, or that in a story, which made a particular point, a character in the story said it."

One of our subscribers from Seminole, Florida agrees with her and states, "I think I have found a minor error in your book The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy, though it is undoubtedly more the fault of your quoted source than yourself. On page 160, Gerald Sigal's The Jew and the Christian Missionary is quoted and uses Luke 19:27 as evidence that JC advocated killing enemies. Unfortunately that's not quite accurate, at least to my knowledge. In Luke 19:11-12, it identifies these words of JC as part of a parable concerning 'a certain noble man.'...although it was JC speaking, he was quoting Herod's attempt to reclaim his throne and quash rebellious peasants after he had made his journey, which can hardly be held against him."

In any event, we included this major issue because of its potential impact on the alleged perfection of Jesus Christ. If, in fact, Jesus told people to bring his enemies before him and slay them, his decency and humaneness, indeed his credibility itself, is dealt a staggering blow. On the other hand, we have refrained from focusing on this critical comment because of the ambiguity of the text. Although definitely in keeping with some comments by Jesus, it's at variance with others. For now we are content with having made our readers aware of the controversy and, perhaps, motivating them to do some independent research. Anyone who can definitively prove Jesus was referring to himself in Luke 19:27 will have all but decimated any Christian claims to tolerance, open-mindedness, and civil discourse. In effect, Jesus would be saying: Believe my way or die. Judging by the number of religious executions that occurred during the Middle Ages, that could very well be how many Christians interpreted it.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #666 from CK of Bloomfield, New Jersey (Part a)

(CK wrote letter #630 in the September issue and now seeks to again claim that the bowl with a diameter of 10 and a circumference of 30 in 1 Kings 7:23 can be explained by using the rounding defense, as can the difference between 470,000 and 500,000 in 1 Chron. 21:5 and 2 Sam. 24:9, respectively--Ed.).

Dear Mr. McKinsey. Returning to the subject of my letter #630 I have looked through your Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy and found many Biblical discrepancies of number that, indeed, cannot be explained away by rounding. (However, he does not think that allowing the rounding defense in the 10-cubit-versus-30-cubit case and the 500,000-versus-470,000 case would automatically allow biblicists to explain away the other contradictions. Apparently he feels these are exceptions and quotes a letter from a college professor who agrees with him--Ed.).

In establishing the larger point (of the Bible's complete unreliability), let's not use spurious arguments that only make the case less compelling. Even a completely unreliable book does not always err. This is not a game to score personal points, but a means of convincing people of the truth.

(Another letter by CK dwells on the same point--Ed.) I appreciate your new printer--it makes everything easier to read. I am frustrated, however, at my inability to get across my mathematical points. If two reporters cover a meeting at which, say, a precise tally of attenders showed 2133 persons in attendance, and one reporter chose to say it was attended by 2100 persons and another reported 2000, both would be correct. Also, they are independent. The second reporter didn't take the first reporter's already rounded 2100 and round it again to 2000--each used a different level of rounding right from the get-go. There is not a set of 100 missing people. Likewise 470,000 and 500,000 are two independently rounded versions of the same number, which for sake of argument, might very well be 469,254 for all we know. To say the burden of proof lies on the alleger would be onerous for the newspaper reporters mentioned above--what can they do, provide an affidavit from the ticket sellers?--but then how can you trust them?....You state that the Bible does not imply, much less state, that the figures are the result of rounding or approximating. In any real-world measurement there always is rounding....

Editor's Response to Letter #666 (Part a)

Your comment with respect to the reporters is just about the whole ball game my friend. The attendance at a ball game was 2133 and you say that if "one reporter chose to say it was attended by 2100 persons and another reported 2000, both would be correct." One misses it by 33 and another by 133 and you're telling me they are both correct. Too bad I didn't have you as my math teacher when I took calculus in college and got a C. Defenders of the Bible just can't seem to realize that we are dealing with God's inerrant word, not some reporter's guesstimate. We are dealing with a flawless book and yet I'm supposed to believe that erroneous figures are somehow accurate.

All this emphasis on rounding is quite secondary to the central issue which is that the figures don't agree. I am well aware of the fact that rounding occurs in the real world and I repeat my assertion that the burden of proving these are roundings lies on the allegor. What really counts, however, is that 470,000 is not 500,000, period. Whether either is a product of rounding doesn't really matter. Either the figures agree or they don't. And the fact is they don't. And that's about all that needs to be said on that matter. All of the letters I have received over the years with their highly abstruse and convoluted mathematical calculations intended to resolve these contradictions are nothing more than apologetic smoke and mirrors seeking to prove black is white. The only spurious aspect regarding this issue is that emanating from defenses thrown up by those desperate for an out.

As far as a bowl having a circumference of 30 with a diameter of 10 is concerned the same principle applies. Anyone who thinks this is an accurate biblical calculation should make some ball bearings that are 10 centimeters in diameter and 30 centimeters in circumference (quite a trick!) and put them into an aircraft in which they intend to take the next flight. The unwillingness of apologists to accept this challenge should reveal the extent to which they really have confidence in their own contentions. They know as well as I how long that aircraft would stay in the air. They expound this nonsense but that doesn't mean they are willing to put their lives in jeopardy or die for it.

Letter #666 Concludes (Part b)

Please note that it is my love of mathematical truth, as well as criticisms I have received from even non-believers that some of your criticism is too picky, that persuade me to write this. But it really bothers me that persons on the same side of the Bible issue have to be at cross purposes like this.

I will be making inquiries this week with my cable provider concerning the community access channels. Do you have any listing of the topics that each episode on your tapes covers? When you say that we must make the necessary arrangements, does that mean also converting 1/2" tapes to 3/4" if that is what the cable company needs? That certainly sounds more daunting than merely delivering the tape to the cable company.

Editor's Response to Letter #666 (Part b)

From the perspective of many biblicists, CK, any criticism of the Bible is too picky. Despite many allegations to the contrary, no criticism of the Bible found in this publication has ever been "too picky." I have never inserted a criticism without having first taken account of this potential response. If they think I am going to exclude salient points merely because "they" think they're too trivial or they've been told as much, then they had best reconsider. I have no intention of judging the value of a contradiction or forestalling its inclusion on the basis of evaluations by apologists.

I realize you are basically a supporter of our cause but I feel compelled to respond in a manner commensurate with the temper of the letter received. Unfortunately all of your mathematical arguments boil down to one simple contention--two different numbers are the same number--and that's just not going to fly.

In any event, I would like to thank you for trying to get our cable access tapes aired in your area. Our tapes are in 1/2 inch format so if your station requires 3/4 inch tapes then you will need to make the conversion. That can't be avoided I am sorry to say.

We don't have a table of contents for the programs, although they closely follow the sequence of chapters in my book. Again, thanks for the assistance and I hope my response didn't sound too ascerbic.

Letter #667 from DA of La Puente, California (Part a)

(DA makes no attempt to introduce our readers to the topic he is debating so I am repeatedly left with the task of orienting our subscribers to what is being discussed. Apparently he thinks I am the only one who will read his letters (that's understandable) and I have memorized all of my back issues which is virtually impossible. In this issue he says--Ed.),

Dear McKinsey. Meant to write a letter an issue. Well, you will have to be "satisfied" with several issues in one letter.

#150. (He means issue #150--Ed.) At least you are not entirely letters to the editor this time. (How I could be a letter eludes me. DA needs to polish his writing skills--Ed.). Your claimed conflict between 2 Tim. 3:12 ("All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution") and Prov. 16:7 ("When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him") is a trivial version of a more serious question (How to reconcile a good god with evil events.) At that trivial level, the believer in a perfect bible can easily wiggle free of your arguments.

To start with, there is no logical conflict between the 2 statements. Tim. refers to "all that will live godly..." while Prov. refers to "when a man's ways please the Lord.." The 2 can be said to be the same, but there is no logical necessity of that, and thus no necessity for a conflict here. The same applies to the other half of the statements. "suffer him" are not mutually exclusive. (It is not unusual for example to at least claim peace and friendship for the victim you are about to execute. This practice may be a tad devious since they don't try to let the victim go, but it does show that you can be persecuted by those at peace with you.)

& your asserting at considerable length that these are universals does not make them so. Prov. in particular does not say that none can be persecuted, nor at any time. It would seem on the face of it to be a generalist statement.

Editor's Response to Letter #667 (Part a)

You are at it again, DA, so let's take them by the numbers.

First, in typical apologetic style you changed the problem by saying, "Your claimed conflict...is a trivial version of a more serious question (How to reconcile a good god with evil events.)." You are actually talking about an internal clash raised within 2 Tim. 3:12 itself. We aren't talking about the problem of evil in general but of persecution by enemies in particular. The issue is narrowly focused and specific.

Second, I am glad you are willing to admit that believers must wiggle free rather than confront head-on.

Third, and even more important, you say, "To start with, there is no logical conflict between the 2 statements. Tim. refers to 'all that will live godly...' while Prov. refers to 'when a man's ways please the Lord..' the 2 can be said to be the same, but there is no logical necessity of that, and thus no necessity for a conflict here." Yet, you provide no evidence of same.

Apparently we are supposed to take your word for it. When Prov. says "a man's ways please the Lord" it is referring to all those who live godly. How, then, does that differ from Tim referring to all those that live godly?

Fourth, your comment that, "It is not unusual for example to at least claim peace and friendship for the victim you are about to execute. This practice may be a tad devious since they don't try to let the victim go, but it does show that you can be persecuted by those at peace with you" makes no sense. What kind of an answer is this? Your obsession with defending the Bible at all costs is a sight to behold, DA. It is an exercise in mental gymnastics to even follow your "train of thought." Who cares what people claim or who is faked out? Are we talking about assertions or reality? What does the verse say? Prov. 16 says that if your ways please the Lord, your enemies will not harm you. If the man killed you, obviously he was your enemy, regardless of what he claimed or you thought.

Fifth, you say, "it does show that you can be persecuted by those at peace with you." How can you be persecuted by somebody who is at peace with you? The very act of persecuting you shows that he is not at peace with you. And you have all but ignored Prov. 16 which says, "When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him"

Sixth, you say, "& your asserting at considerable length that these are universals does not make them so. Prov. in particular does not say that none can be persecuted, nor at any time. It would seem on the face of it to be a generalist statement." What are you talking about? Prov. 16 clearly states that any man whose ways please the Lord will be at peace with his enemies, i.e., will not be persecuted by them. In other words, as far as a man whose ways please the Lord is concerned, Scripture is making an absolutist statement and creating another tar-baby for the Bible and its defenders, such as yourself.

And lastly, you say, "It would seem on the face of it to be a generalist statement." Are you or are you not saying it is an a general statement? If you are, then we are in agreement and you have contradicted your comment that "your asserting at considerable length that these are universals does not make them so." If you are saying this is not a general statement, then we have already shown the error of your ways.

Letter #667 Continues (Part b)

Your comments on Isa. 26:19 ("The dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise") and 1 Cor. 15:52 ("The trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible") versus Job 7:9 ("He that goeth down to the grave, they shall come up no more") and Isa. 26:14 ("They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise") also shows more of the lawyer than the logician. Job 7:9 is Job speaking, not the author of Job. His statement thus has no more standing than would a character in a story who statement that $2+2=5$ hardly means the author made an error.

Isa. 26:14 refers to certain enemies of the ancient Jews while 26:19 refers to the Jews. No conflict there either. Your making it sound like one reflects poorly on your credibility.

Editor's Response to Letter #667 (Part b)

Your "reconciliation" of this problem is not some-thing one would expect from either a lawyer or a logi-cian. If that transparent defense were allowed, every erroneous statement in the Bible could be attributed to the character who made it rather than the author of Scripture who is supposedly God. If Moses, David, Solomon, Paul or Peter made one of their usual absurd remarks, you could just say, "Well that's just them speaking, not God." In that event, the inerrancy of Scripture would be all but decimated and every reader would be unrestrained with respect to which parts can be attributed to characters within the Bible as opposed to the alleged author of Scripture itself. In trying to save the Bible you have all but destroyed its credibility. You say, "Job 7:9 is Job speaking, not the author of Job." How do you know it's not God speaking through Job? After all God is allegedly the author. What is your criterion for determining when God is speaking as opposed to one of the characters in a book written by God who is merely speaking for himself? I have heard this defense on several occasions and it's no more valid now than when first proposed. Chaos will reign supreme if you stick with this argument. You have not only thrown out the baby with the bathwater but the tub as well. Everyone, pro and anti Bible, will be free to pick and choose what he or she wishes to attribute to God directly, as opposed to the biblical figure who is speaking. This ruse has already been surreptitiously adopted by a sizable portion of the Christian community and that is a major reason why more than 1,500 separate Christian denominations currently glut the market. If Job 7:9 can not definitely be attributed to God then what part of Scripture can? For all practical purposes, virtually the entire book is up for grabs.

You say, "Isa. 26:14 refers to certain enemies of the ancient Jews while 26:19 refers to the Jews." It's interesting how you ducked the real issue in true apologetic style. What difference does the composition of the groups make in this instance. First Cor. 15:52 ("The trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible") says the dead shall be raised while Isa. 26:14 ("They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise") says they won't. Either they will rise or they won't. Either way, one of these verses is false. You say Isa. 26:14 only refers to certain enemies of the Jews, as if this altered the central issue. All you are saying is that a certain group of people will not rise from the dead which directly contradicts 1 Cor. 15:52. Your attempt to focus on the conflict between Isa. 26:14 and 19 has no weight because even if Isa. 26:19 refers to the Jews, as you are assuming, it does not say ONLY the Jews will arise. First Cor. 15:52 incorporates Isa. 26:19 and is all inclusive. That's why the main clash is between 1 Cor. 15:52 and Isa. 26:14, not Isa. 26:19 and Isa. 26:14. Apologists are always yelling about the importance of interpreting Scripture by Scripture, yet they conveniently jettison this poignant maxim when the outcome is unacceptable. Instead of interpreting Isa. 26:19 in light of 1 Cor. 15:52 and seeing that the former was referring to a part of humanity that would rise, while the latter says all will, you preferred to dwell only on the former as if they were the only ones who would arise, which they aren't. It's a neat trick if you can pull it off, but you didn't make it.

Letter #667 Continues (Part c)

(Regarding the Psalm 78:69/Eccle. 1:4 versus Luke 21:33/2Peter 3:10 clash and my comment that "if it has an end, then it can't be forever" DA says--Ed.),

In English , and then only in general. Even in English we often use 'forever' to refer to very long periods of time, and sometimes to periods of time that are merely indefinite and may be quite short.... The Bible is a translation. Errors by the translators are not errors in the Bible, merely errors in the translation. So you must show that 'olam' means precisely 'without any end at all.' The meaning of 'forever' is not important here.

Editor's Response to Letter #667 (Part c)

Unfortunately there comes a time in an ongoing publication like this that we should draw a line for the sake of our readership and say: If you had read our back issues you would have seen the error of your ways and not written such imprudence. I have demolished this defense on numerous occasions and there is no need to tax our readers' patience any longer, although I probably will, because I can't resist the temptation. What I said on the 2nd page of the 150th issue, which you have apparently chosen to ignore, encompasses not only this issue but many contradictions and defenses that are quite similar. I said, "Stripped to its bare essentials, all Haley is saying is that 'forever' doesn't mean forever. It has an end which happens to be hidden. But if it has an 'end,' then it can't be forever. He's hoping his readers will swallow this doubletalk. All three verses in the first group say 'forever.' What would the authors have had to say in order to convince Haley that when they said 'forever' they meant 'forever,' not merely an indefinite period with a hidden end. It is often hard to imagine how the Bible's authors could have written something to make the Book's defenders admit it means exactly what the words state. One can't help but feel the Book's defenders are telling its authors: You don't really mean that; to which the authors would no doubt reply: Oh yes we do. In this instance, there is no word or series of words the authors could have used that apologists would not have perverted in such a manner as to make them mean something less than 'eternal' or 'forever.'"

You say, "Even in English we often use 'forever' to refer to very long periods of time, and sometimes to periods of time that are merely indefinite and may be quite short." Then the statement is false. Why is that so hard to understand? We aren't dealing with everyday parlance in which people understand you mean something less than forever when you tell someone you will love them forever. We are dealing with God's perfect book. And that's in a very different realm. The Bible is a kind of contract. What do you think an opposing attorney would say to you if your client signed a contract in which the final clause said it was to be permanent and you said your client only meant a couple of years? You and I both know he would have a field day. That's what would happen. If your kind of textual alteration were permitted, you'd all but destroy the Bible's believability. How would you know what is to be taken at face value and what is to be interpreted according to the expediency you're proposing? And who makes that determination? As I have said before, if your premise prevails, you will have as many Bibles as you have readers. Essentially your argument is nothing more than a variation on the overdone apologetic defense of: That's what it says but that's not what it means. If that's not what it means, then it shouldn't have said it. It also has elements of: "You are being too literal"--another hackneyed defense. I always work on the assumption that the Bible means what it says and says what it means, a principle you ignore regularly.

You say, "The Bible is a translation. Errors by the translators are not errors in the Bible, merely errors in the translation." How do you know we are dealing with errors in translation? How do you know it was not translated correctly? What are your Greek/Hebrew qualifications and do they exceed those of people on the translating committees. I know almost nothing about you, but I would seriously doubt they even come close. Translators chose the word "forever" on several occasions and unless they are utterly incompetent, they are fully aware of its implications and Webster's definition.

Then you say, "So you must show that 'olam' means precisely 'without any end at all.'" No my friend. You must prove it's not eternal. The burden rests on your shoulders. You must prove that several committees of experts translating several versions don't have their acts together and you know how to translate better than they--you could have chosen a better word than they. If the word "olam" (forever) in Psalm 104:5 and Eccle. 1:4 means what you say, then any first year college student in Greek/Hebrew could have done a better job of translating. More accurate words and phrases would have been: a long time, quite a while, a long period, or something comparable.

And then you say, "The meaning of 'forever' is not important here." I beg to differ. The meaning of every biblical term is "important here." What you really mean is that you don't want it to be important here. That way, you can alter its meaning and escape through the back door. I know how you apologists detest absolutist terms being interpreted absolutely, but that's the bind you enter when you unwisely choose to defend the indefensible. As I have said before, people prone to your kind of defense need to write their own version of the bible and send me a copy which I would be glad to critique.

I also know how you don't like reading our back issues and recoil at the prospect of buying any more than the minimum. But that's the price you have to pay for progress and enlightenment. (To Be Continued)

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #668 from CK of Bloomfield, New Jersey

Dear Mr. McKinsey. Yesterday I called up my local cable company to inquire about having your tapes played on the community access channels. The person in charge of this programming said that as her cable company covers 30 towns in northern New Jersey, they cannot accept programming that is not produced locally. Perhaps as a concession to me as a customer they would run one tape once. I don't know what would happen if subscribers from more than one of the communities (as many as possible) were to request the same tapes be played, and I don't know if you have other subscribers to team up in the Northern New Jersey territory of ComCast Cable .

Editor's Response to Letter #668

Dear CK. We appreciate your help and know that obstacles of this kind occur regularly. Who will or will not accept locally produced programming appears to be more an intuitive reaction on the part of a station's management than any decision by the FCC or elsewhere. I think they respond more to public pressure and determination than anything else. Just keep pushing; don't lessen your resolve; watch the station continually, and look for programs that are not locally produced. If they appear, spring into action by asking the station's management: "If them, why not me?"

April 1996

A national periodical focusing on Biblical errors, contradictions, and fallacies, while providing a hearing for apologists

COMMENTARY

Probably the most prominent apologetic organization in the United States is the Christian Research Institute in Irvin, California. Founded years ago by the Bible Answer Man of radio, the late Dr. Walter Martin, it publishes a periodical entitled The Christian Research Journal. On pages 47 and 48 of the 1996 Winter issue is a critique of my book entitled: A Summary Critique: The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy. The article is written by Gleason Archer, professor Emeritus of Old Testament and Semitic languages at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School in Deerfield, Illinois and author of the Encyclopedia of Bible Difficulties. Although billed as a critique, his narrative more closely resembles nothing more than some proofreading, since over 99% of The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy wasn't even touched. Apparently I can assume that he found nothing worth criticizing, especially in light of the fact that the final column out of the six columns used is devoted almost exclusively to an indirect approval of my critique of the Koran and The Book of Mormon. Archer's primary concern seems to be focused not so much on the accuracy of my observations relative to the Bible's validity as the hopelessness and moral depravity into which mankind will allegedly plunge if the Bible is destroyed and my anti-supernaturalistic attack upon the God of the Bible is successful. Only later does he provide specific criticisms.

In order to adequately and comprehensively cover his article, this entire issue will be devoted to an analysis of his major points and overall approach.

First, Archer begins by accusing me of going out of my way to revile God when all I did was quote scripture. Among other things I provided a long list of reprehensible deeds committed by the biblical god and for that reason Archer alleges I am engaged in "blasphemy and vituperation directed at God himself," "weighing the Almighty in the balance and finding Him wanting," and "bringing God to task." In truth, I am not bringing the biblical God anywhere, Scripture is; the evidence is. All I did was quote the Book. I didn't say it, the Bible did. It's not my idea; it's Scripture's. How is quoting the Bible "deploring God as a despicable character" and engaging in "blasphemy"? How is that a "diatribe"? "Vituperation" implies I raised my voice or became emotional. Would Archer be so kind as to provide examples of same? On the other hand, if Archer really believes in the God of the Bible, he had better hope that God is willing to forgive him for supporting a book that portrays the Almighty in such a "God-awful" manner, pardon the pun.

Second, he accuses me of attacking "God Himself." Correction! It is the biblical presentation of God that is under the microscope, not what many perceive to be the real god. Thomas Paine, for one, was a strong believer in god, but he detested the biblical description of god and its attribution of atrocious acts to him. To Archer many would say: Don't try to equate the god of the Bible with the real God. The Bible's description of god is appalling and the real god in no way resembles the god of the Bible. Thomas Paine would no doubt strongly object to the propensity of Archer to write as if it were a proven fact that the god described in the Bible is the real God.

Third, near the beginning of the first column Archer states, "the author refuses to seriously consider the elements in the Bible that cannot be explained as human authorship." Instead of providing some examples, however, he merely makes this statement and moves on.

Fourth, at the beginning of the second paragraph he states, "He is no atheist, however, for he often goes out of his way to revile God." Try as I may, I can't make any sense out of that comment.

Fifth, Archer accuses me of depriving "human life of any ultimate meaning." He claims that if God "is basically malevolent, then there is no foundation for any hope or goodness" and he quotes MacBeth to the effect that "Life...is a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." Why belief in God is necessary for meaning in life is something the religious community has never been able to explain. Indeed, more often than not the opposite is true. Feeling this world is all we have and we had better make the most of it, non-religious people are the most motivated to improve society and everything in it. They are the most involved, the most energetic, the most compassionate, the most progressive, the most innovative, and the most concerned with putting meaning into life.

The religious element, on the other hand, especially those closest to fundamentalism and a literal interpretation of the Bible, believe, without proof, that a better world is coming, so there is no need to become very concerned with conditions in this one. After all they reason, if you only live 80 or 90 years in this world why get involved. You aren't going to be here very long or get out of it alive anyway. Those who follow the Bible the closest are the least likely to put meaning into life and the ones most likely to rely upon the unproven, untested nebulous promise of a blissful afterlife. In place of achievable meaning in this world, they substitute unsubstantiated, wishful yearning for an alleged paradisaical next.

Seventh, Archer says, "Without a good and holy God in heaven above, however, there is no solution to be found in freethinking or any other kind of thinking." Again no proof or justification is provided. Just another assertion that is supposed to be sufficient unto itself. Too bad I didn't think of that approach! Instead of devoting so much time and effort to reading and research, I could have just forgotten about all my studies, thrown away my notes, discarded my citations, and told it like it is. That certainly would have been easier.

Eighth, the first five paragraphs out of the 20 submitted are nothing but an argument that the Bible is needed and whether it is true or not is of secondary importance. Archer is more concerned about losing the Book than proving it. He just can't conceive of a world without Scripture, even though millions of people have come and gone, while surviving quite nicely without its presence.

Ninth, not until the sixth paragraph do we exit the world of generalities and enter the realm of specifics. Archer notes my observation that according to Gen. 5:5 Adam did not die until he was 930 years old, even though he was supposed to die, according to God's curse, on the day he ate the forbidden fruit (Gen. 2:17). Archer says, "McKinsey ignores the fact that Adam and Eve did on that very day lose their life of blessed communion with God. Moreover, they came under a divine curse, suffered expulsion from the Garden of Eden, and entered into a state of spiritual death.' The term 'death' has more than one dimension, as McKinsey ought to have known had he studied the biblical use of this word. In fact, Paul (whom McKinsey thoroughly detests) stated that 'the mind set on the flesh is death' (Rom. 8:6). A student of the text should pay attention to the various nuances in which a term may be used rather than oversimplifying it."

This, of course, is the standard apologetic defense that is trotted out to escape a clear-cut comment, as we have noted several times in our publication. If Archer had bothered to read our back issues relative to this issue he would have seen the error of his ways. (a) Nothing is said about a "spiritual" death. It says "thou shalt surely die." Where does it imply, much less state, anything about a spiritual death. Archer says, "Adam and Eve did on that very day lose their life of blessed communion with God." Where does the text say that? He is reading more between the lines than is on them. (b) The word "die" in Gen. 2:17 comes from the Hebrew word "mûwth" (transliterated) which is used approximately 250 times in the OT. Apologists would be hard pressed to find one instance where it does not mean die in the sense that the average person understands the word. Yet, we are supposed to believe that Gen. 2:17 is somehow an exception. We are supposed to believe that 249 have it one way, while only 1 means something else. (c) David sinned against God and in 2 Sam. 12:14 Nathan says to David, "the child also that is born unto thee shall surely die" because of your sin. And the child died according to the 18th verse which says, "And it came to pass on the seventh day, that the child died." If the curse in 2 Sam. 12:14 is an actual physical condemnation, then why isn't the one in Gen. 2:17? (d) If Gen. 2:17 is to be interpreted spiritually, then what criterion are we to follow in order to determine if a verse is to be taken physically or spiritually, literally or figuratively, other than political expediency? Fundamentalists constantly harp upon the importance of interpreting the Bible literally but don't hesitate to abandon this approach when the going gets rough. Why should the literal approach be discarded with respect to Gen. 2:17 but not with respect to all the other references to the word "die" in the OT, such as 2 Sam. 12:14?

Incidentally, why would I "thoroughly detest" Paul in light of the fact that I have never met the man. I have no quarrel with him on a personal basis; it is his ideas and logic I find so reprehensible and contradictory.

Tenth, Archer raises another objection at the bottom of the second column where he says, "McKinsey raises a similar objection against Peter, who quoted Moses: 'Moses truly said unto the fathers. A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me' (Acts 3:22. KJV). On page 437 McKinsey reasons that Jesus could not be God incarnate, since Moses was not God incarnate, nor did Jesus ever claim to be God. Yet how could any of Peter's hearers ever suppose that he was affirming Moses as the Son of God? It was perfectly evident that Moses served as a type of the Messiah as indicated in Hebrews 3:2 ('Jesus was faithful to Him who appointed Him, as Moses also was in all his house')."

To begin with, where did I say Jesus never claimed to be God. If Archer had focused more on what I said and less on refuting me at all costs, he would have easily seen that my exact words were: "...Moses was not God incarnate nor did he ever claim to be such." It was Moses, not Jesus, who made the denial. Apparently Archer is having trouble reading the simplest of grammar. Secondly, Peter's hearers did not have to assume that Peter "was affirming Moses as the Son of God." Archer has it backwards. Peter's hearers would naturally assume that he was referring to a prophet who was not the Son of God because Moses was not the Son of God. And since Jesus allegedly is the Son of God, in his OT predictions Moses could not be referring to Jesus. Archer's entire approach to this problem is far from what is being said.

How does Heb. 3:2 make Moses a type of Jesus? Does Archer mean to say that every time two people are compared to one another in the Bible, one is a type or antitype of the other? Heb. 3:2 is comparing two men to each other on a particular aspect; it is not equating them generally. The text says that both are faithful and that is all. That hardly warrants making one the precursor of the other.

Eleventh, in the 3rd column Archer states, "McKinsey actually joins with those who taunted the crucified Savior on the cross, saying, 'He saved others; He cannot save Himself' (Matt. 27:42). On page 36, where the author quotes Matthew 27:46: 'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?' McKinsey asks incredulously, 'How can Jesus be our Savior when he couldn't even save himself' The crucifixion accounts, of course, make it quite clear that Jesus was perfectly able to save Himself had He so wished. In fact, Jesus stated that He could easily have summoned 12 legions of angels to rescue Him from the cross (Matt. 26:53)." Archer tends to interpret comments in a manner that coincides with his predilections Where did I ever say "He saved others." He deliberately attributed to me a comment made by those denouncing Jesus.

But even more importantly, Archer has a pronounced propensity to accentuate one side of a contradiction while ignoring, minimizing, or discounting the other. He quotes Matt. 26:53 ("Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than 12 legions of angels?") to prove that Jesus could have saved himself had he so chosen, as if this destroyed the impact of Matt. 27:46. Hardly! Matt. 26:53 may say that he can save himself had he so chosen but Matt. 27:46 shows he could not. Archer also conveniently failed to mention my quote from Gerald Sigal who poignantly denied that Jesus came into the world to willingly die for mankind on the cross. Sigal stated, "If that was true, why did he hesitate and pray for the reversal of the fate prescribed for him. Matt. 26:39 says, 'going a little way forward, he fell upon his face praying and saying, My Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass from me. Yet, not as I will, but as you will.' Jesus' exclamation: 'Yet, not as I will, but as you will,' undoubtedly indicates that had it been his choice, he would not have undergone execution. And why did Jesus, the god-man, need an angel to strengthen him in Luke 22:43?" In other words, instead of recognizing this problem for what it is--a contradiction--Archer chose to just ignore one side and stress the other. He acts as if Jesus never made the comments found in Matt. 27:46, 26:39 and Luke 22:43. It's a neat feat if you can pull it off and no doubt many have succumbed over the centuries.

Twelfth, at the end of the 3rd column Archer states, "McKinsey's inadequacy in Hebrew and Greek appears in his naive treatment of the Sixth Commandment. He asserts that more recent English translations have altered the King James 'Thou shalt not kill' to 'You shall not murder' in order to excuse capital punishment (p. 84. Both the Hebrew tirsah and the Septuagint Greek phoneuo, however, specifically refer to first-degree murder."

(A) If Archer had read our back issues he would be aware of the fact that this criticism has been addressed on several occasions. What he is saying, in effect, is that he knows Hebrew better, or could have done a better job of translating, than those who composed the King James Version. According to him implicitly, modern scholarship has supposedly updated the more archaic King James translation. Of course, he neglects to mention the fact that many relatively recent translations such as the RSV, the NAB, the ASV, the JB, and the Lamsa Version used 'kill' as well. All say "kill" rather than "murder" in Exodus 20:13. There is a big difference between killing and murdering If every killing is murder, then soldiers, police, executioners, and those killing in self-defense are nothing more than criminals. The word "murder" is encompassed within the word "kill" because, although every murder is a killing, not every killing is a murder. The two are not identical and it is very important to note that the translators of these modern versions chose "kill" over "murder." In so doing, they chose a very definite concept. By saying "murder" should have been used rather than "kill" Archer is accusing these translators of being incompetent, and I seriously doubt that his years of teaching Hebrew exceed that of many scholars who have combined to produce several of the most prominent versions on the market.

(B) Archer says, "Both the Hebrew tirsah and the Septuagint Greek phoneuo, however, specifically refer to first-degree murder." He might want to discuss this matter with James Strong whose Exhaustive Concordance says the word "kill" in Ex. 20:13 comes from the word "râtsach," not "tirsah" and it means "to dash in pieces, i.e., kill (a human being), especially to murder:--put to death, kill, manslay, murder." Not only is Archer disagreeing with Strong over the Hebrew source but in no sense is Strong saying it refers to first degree murder only. So Archer finds himself not only at odds with the translators of several major versions but with the creator of probably the most famous concordance in the United States. A little more research would no doubt expose additional scholars at odds with Archer's interpretation.

Thirteenth, Archer continues by saying, "McKinsey also blunders with regard to the name of the hill where Christ was crucified (p. 96), for he imagines a discrepancy between Golgotha and Calvary. Apparently he is unaware that Golgotha means "skull" in Aramaic and that Calvarium means exactly the same thing in Latin. He overlooks the fact that Latin was the language of the Roman government in Christ's time." I was well aware of the fact that this criticism would be made when I inserted this conflict into the text, but I felt readers ought to be aware of this discrepancy. If Archer had been more concerned with honesty and less with refutation, he would have noted that I specifically stated, "Some apologists disputably allege Golgotha is the Hebrew rendering while Calvary is Latin." But Archer conveniently chose to omit any reference to my qualification.

Fourteenth, Archer continues by switching from a critique of my book to a one-sided monologue extolling the Bible's alleged prophetic accuracy and degrading the predictive capability of mankind, all the while totally oblivious to all the problems associated with Bible prophecy so clearly outlined in my book. He states, "McKinsey also dabbles with prophecies that he construes to be unfulfilled, but his judgment is mistaken in every case. Beginning with the promise of the Satan-crushing seed of the woman (Gen. 3:15), a plan unfolds. God announced to Abraham that the Egyptian sojourn of his descendants would last four hundred years before they return as a nation and take possession of Canaan (Gen. 15:13-14). After the Israelites conquest, God's prophets continued with messages of assurance in times of national crisis. Such was the promise of a son of Isaiah, who would be born of a virgin, and within whose lifetime Judah would be saved from Assyrian forces (Isa. 7:14-16). After the Battle of El Tekah, 185,000 of the Assyrian troops suddenly died by a plague, forcing Sennacherib to abandon his siege of Jerusalem (cf. Isa. 36)."

Archer completely ignored: what I said on pages 153 and 191 in the Encyclopedia with respect to Gen. 3:15, what I said on page 174 about Ex. 12:40 refuting Gen. 15:13, and what I said in regard to why Isa. 7:14 was not referring to a virgin or Jesus. In the latter instance, for example, Archer is saying a son of Isaiah would be born of a virgin and within his lifetime Judah would be saved from the Assyrians. The son was to be a sign to Ahaz and, among other things, I asked how the birth of Jesus, who is allegedly this son, could be a sign to Ahaz who lived 600 years before Jesus. This, too, Archer chose to ignore.

Actually Archer isn't even interpreting this verse precisely from a fundamentalist perspective because he failed to correlate it with the birth of Jesus by leaving the entire event back in the time it occurred. That is probably, in part, because Isaiah refers to "a virgin, ...within whose lifetime Judah would be saved from Assyrian forces" and since the Assyrian Empire disappeared over 600 years before Jesus was even born Archer deemed it more expedient to remain with the Ahaz era.

Fifteenth, continuing with his prophetic parade of preferred predictions he says, "An even more remarkable prediction is found in the ninth chapter of the Book of Daniel, which foretells a period of 483 years between the issuance of a decree 'to restore and build Jerusalem' (later granted by Artaxerxes I in 458 B.C.) 'until Messiah the Prince.' Four hundred eighty-three years after 457 B.C. comes out to A. D. 26, when Jesus began His teaching ministry in Israel. For this fulfillment there is no possibility of a pious fraud, since the Book of Daniel was composed centuries earlier than the date of fulfillment." Talk about playing fast and loose with the facts! This is a prime example of the sophistry so often associated with apologetic rationalizations.

(A) Archer rigged the time at which the clock was supposed to start running. The decree was issued by Cyrus according to Isa. 44:28 ("That saith of Cyrus. He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid") and that occurred in 536 B.C., not 458 B.C.

(B) He slipped in a rather neat little deception that you would have missed had you blinked. He stated "a period of 483 years between the issuance of a decree 'to restore and build Jerusalem' (later granted by Artaxerxes I in 458 B.C.) 'until Messiah the Prince.'" Notice! He started the clock running when Artaxerxes "granted the decree" not when it was issued much earlier by Cyrus. The prophecy is not referring to when the decree was actually executed but when it was issued. And that occurred long before Artaxerxes came on the scene. Archer is desperately trying to alter the beginning date so as to make it coincide with the arrival of Jesus.

(C) What does the prophecy say? It says 483 years from the decree "until Messiah the Prince." And when did Jesus come on the scene. When he was born, naturally, not 26 years later when he allegedly began his ministry. Archer just arbitrarily picked the age of 26 in order to, again, make the prophecy look cogent, when he has no more idea when Jesus began his ministry than I do. Where does Scripture say Jesus began preaching at age 26 or at any age for that matter? Except for a brief reference to a temple encounter around age 12, almost nothing is known about the life of Jesus until he was around age 30, although this, too, is somewhat nebulous. Other prophetic difficulties with the Book of Daniel are covered in the Encyclopedia but Archer chose to ignore them.

In fact, Archer's entire strategy with respect to the prophetic problems enumerated in my Encyclopedia was to avoid them and concentrate, instead, on those that he felt were most convincing, as if a few alleged hits nullified a mountain of duds. Instead of focusing on all the problems enumerated in the Encyclopedia, he chose, instead, to scramble over to those deemed most secure. Unfortunately, they aren't very strong either.

Sixteenth, continuing his prophetic journey, Archer says, "Another prediction (allegedly accurate--Ed.), found in Deuteronomy 28:68 ('And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again with ships, by the way whereof I spake unto thee, Thou shalt see it no more again: and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you') foretells the mass transportation of the Jewish survivors of the capture of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 by Titus, who (according to Josephus) shipped 97,000 to the slave market in Alexandria, Egypt. Instead of recognizing this as proof of divine foreknowledge, McKinsey complains that it violated God's earlier promise to Moses that His people would never return to Egypt. Deuteronomy 28:68, however, acknowledges that this compelled return would be an exception. The fact remains that here is a promise that dates back to 1445 B.C. (if it is genuinely Mosaic) and extends to A.D., a total of 1,515 years!"

Three major deceptions plague this analysis. (a) Nowhere in the text does the word "Titus" appear. Archer arbitrarily assumed that since the events surrounding 70 A.D. fit rather well into what he is trying to sell, why not use them. (b) If he had bothered to read what occurred earlier, he would have seen that the text is not referring to the transportation of Jews to Egypt by Titus but the return of the Jews from nations "from the one end of the earth even unto the other." Four verses earlier, Deut. 28:64 says, "And the Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods.... And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest.... " followed later by verse 68 which begins "And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again with ships...." And (c) Archer tries to lightly sluff off a major contradiction between Deut. 17:15-16 ("One from among your brethren you shall set as king over you; you may not put a foreigner over you, who is not your brother. Only he must not multiply horses for himself, or cause the people to return to Egypt in order to multiply horses, since the Lord has said to you, ' You shall never return that way again") and Deut. 28 :68 (which was quoted earlier) by saying, "McKinsey complains that it violated God's earlier promise to Moses that His people would never return to Egypt." Why would I complain? Quite the contrary, I'm rather amused by the fact that a biblical contradiction is so clearly evident. If anyone should be complaining it should be apologists trapped in a cul de sac with no escape.

In addition, Archer alleges that Deut. 28:68 "acknowledges that this compelled return would be an exception." No it doesn't! It doesn't somehow permit itself to be an exception to the absolute laid down in Deut. 17:15-16. It just relates an exception which thereby creates the contradiction. Archer is acting as if Deut. 28:68 has permission to overrule Deut. 17:15-16.

Seventeenth, near the bottom of the 5th out of 6th columns Archer continues his prophetic journey by referring to a couple of passages in Isaiah. He states, "Two other remarkable prophecies are found in Isaiah. The first passage (13:19-22) foretells the utter destruction and desertion of Babylon, which was the largest and wealthiest city in the world at the time. The entire area around Babylon absorbed so much salt from millennia of irrigation that it became impractical to do any farming there. No farming; no inhabitants in the city. The fulfillment of this prediction defies any naturalistic explanation." For some reason Archer failed to actually quote Isaiah 13:19-22 which says, "And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation: neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their fold there. But the wild beast of the desert shall lie there, and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there. And the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces; and her time is near to come, and her days shall not be prolonged." As we noted in an earlier issue of our publication, these prophecies have never occurred. (a) Babylon has never gotten the Sodom and Gomorrah treatment; (b) there has never been any time since Isaiah that

Babylon was uninhabited; (c) Arabians still visit there; (d) Shepherds still make their folds there; (e) it has never been known for its dancing satyrs and dragons in the palaces and (f) apparently its days have been prolonged, since Babylon still exists, although significantly changed.

And lastly, Archer concludes his prophetic odyssey to nowhere by giving me the impression that I don't think he really read all of the book to begin with. Apparently, although I may be wrong, he read about as much as he could take and then adopted a hit-or-miss approach. I say this because, among other things, he alleges Isaiah 52:13 to 53:12 "clearly explained the passion week of our Lord Christ and the substitutionary nature of His death." Then he says, "Both John 12:38 and Romans 10:16 refer to the fulfillment of this prophecy. It is untenable to say these fulfillments are human inventions or forgeries." He seems to be entirely unaware of all the problems we enumerated with respect to these verses. It is hard to believe that he would have made such a grandiose faux pas after having read the Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy.

The most appropriate summation of Archer's approach to the prophetic dilemmas cited in my book is that rather than assaulting the incredible number of dead-ends that have no honest reconciliation, Archer chose, instead, to dwell on those that struck his fancy. But ironically, even his own choices fall flat by failing to exhibit the perspicacity they allegedly possess.

The 6th and final column is little more than a cheering section for my treatment of the Koran and The Book of Mormon. After relating many points made with respect to both, Archer concludes by referring to my "often-valid criticisms of Mormon and Muslim scriptures...."

Archer summarized his entire excursion by saying, "McKinsey's Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy mainly reflects the author's obsession with twisting the Word of God and ridiculing its supposed discrepancies. I find the book a waste of time. Suffice it to say that most of the passages he works on have been satisfactorily handled in my book, An Encyclopedia of Bible Difficulties."

Leaving aside the fact that my book proves the Bible is anything but the word of a perfect being, and Archer's Encyclopedia doesn't address the overwhelming majority of its criticisms, the only twisting involved is that exhibited by Archer's sophistry. A real waste of time consists in reading clearly contrived explanations concocted by someone who has devoted most of his life to defending at all costs a belief system the refutation of which would devastate its possessor.

The most glaring disclosure to be drawn from Archer's article, aside from the fact that the first column irrelevantly decries what would become of mankind were the Bible to be proved a fraud and the last column applauds our analysis of two extra-biblical books, is that most of the remaining material doesn't even discuss what is covered in our Book. After having discovered the anemic nature of Archer's exposition, I can understand why. As was noted earlier, his commentary more closely resembles some proof-reading than any kind of real critique. In view of the fact that over 99% of our book isn't even discussed, his alleged "critique" actually amounts to little more than a backhanded endorsement. If you're not inclined to touch it, that's an indirect attestation to its potency.

LETTER TO THE CHRISTIAN RESEARCH INSTITUTE

CRI did not send me a copy of the Journal in which Archer's article appeared nor did they bother to tell me my work had been criticized by Archer. If it had not been for a couple of my subscribers sending me a photocopy of the article I might not have ever known of its existence. Only after I contacted CRI and asked for an opportunity to reply did they volunteer to send me a copy. I was told my response would have to be restricted to approximately 200 words which is little short of ridiculous in light of the fact that Archer's analysis utilized 10 times as many words. I was also told that my reply could only appear in the Letters to the Editor section. Their spokeswoman suggested that I write a much more extensive response in my own periodical, so I agreed, despite the injustice involved. What follows is the verbatim response I sent to CRI for inclusion in the next edition of their Journal:

The most glaring disclosure emanating from Archer's review of my book is that over 99% of the volume isn't even addressed. The first column irrelevantly decries what would become of mankind if the Bible were proved to be fraudulent; the sixth and final column does little more than applaud my treatment of the Koran and The Book of Mormon, and most of that which remains focuses on a few prophecies, nearly all of which aren't discussed in my book but struck Archer's fancy. The April 1996 Issue (160th) of our monthly publication entitled BIBLICAL ERRANCY will show that not only the prophecies which Archer himself presented, but the few specific contradictions he does attempt to rationalize can't stand the strain of critical analysis. Virtually the entire issue will be devoted to an itemized refutation of nearly every point in his litany. Although he says reading the book "is a waste of time," I have little doubt that he doesn't even believe that himself. But he's hoping you will. Billed as a "summary critique," Archer's presentation could more accurately be described as some minor proof-reading in what amounts to little more than a backhanded endorsement. If you're not inclined to touch it, that's an indirect attestation to its potency. For those who really desire to know the facts by reading the most comprehensive refutation of the Bible available, I strongly recommend that they not only obtain a copy of The ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BIBLICAL ERRANCY from either myself or Prometheus Press but a copy of the April issue of our periodical as well. COMMENTARY

This month's issue will resume our on-going program of devoting an entire issue of BE to letters from readers.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #667 from DA of La Puente, California Continues from the March Issue (Part d)

[On the second page of the 150th issue we stated, Haley's "reconciliation" of John 3:13 ("And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven") with 2 Kings 2:11 ("Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven") is exceptionally weak. He states, "In the first text Jesus, setting forth his own superior authority, says substantially, 'No human being can speak from personal knowledge, as I do, who came down from heaven. No man hath ascended up to heaven to bring back tidings'." But the text says nothing of the kind. Where does Jesus say anything about speaking from personal knowledge or bringing back tidings? DA leaps to Haley's defense by saying--Ed.],

Your treatment of John 3:13 is another case where you seem to be thinking "I hope the reader won't bother to check up on me." because you just ignore the context that makes it quite clear Jesus is doing as Haley says, asserting his eye-witness knowledge, not saying Hea-ven is empty.

Editor's Response to Letter #667 (Part d)

You are really out of the ball-park on this one, DA. You'd be wise to hope people don't read your defense. First, who said anything about Heaven being empty? What does that have to do with the issue? We are talking about who has "ascended" to heaven and who hasn't. Whether or not someone is there is both irrelevant and immaterial. Second, where does Jesus imply, much less state, that "No human being can speak from personal knowledge, as I do, who came down from heaven." Your defense is beyond taking things out of context. You just blindly followed Haley who created one of his own. He is reading more between the lines than is on them. Where does Jesus say no one else can speak from personal knowledge regarding this matter? I see nothing in either verse having anything to do with someone having more knowledge than someone else. And third, Haley states that this means "No man hath ascended up to heaven to bring back tidings." Would you kindly show me where the word tidings or something comparable appears? You would have done well to have steered clear of this jewel, but you couldn't resist slugging the tar baby.

Letter #667 Continues (Part e)

Nor is there a conflict between Matt. 21:31 ("The publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you") with 1 Cor. 6:9-10 ("Neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God"). Really amazing here. You casually print the obvious explanation and then somehow think you are refuting it. Perhaps what you are refusing to see is that Matthew is merely comparative. It does not say any sinners will or won't get into heaven. Rather it ranks their chances. Harlots are more likely to make it than chief priests.

Editor's Response to Letter #667 (Part e)

The only aspect that is really amazing DA is your apparent belief that your amateurish rationalization is going to somehow carry the day. You state, "what you are refusing to see is that Matthew is merely comparative. It does not say any sinners will or won't get into heaven. Rather it ranks their chances. Harlots are more likely to make it than chief priests." Matt. 21:31 is comparative and does say that both the harlot and the priests will get into heaven in sequence. But the conflict is not between one part of Matthew 21:31 and another. It's between Matt. 21:31 and 1 Cor. 6:9-10. The latter says sinners, specifically harlots in our case, will not get into heaven, period, and there is no sequence. You created a bogus conflict and then destroyed its viability, only to expose your own duplicity.

Letter #667 Continues (Part f)

A problem you have is you tend to read any 2 statements so that if there is a possible conflict, there is a conflict. This is, of course, the reverse of how one reads a text, Bible, contract, studybook, whatever. If there is any way to read the text that avoids the conflict, that reading is adopted. Finding a possible conflict is only the first step in showing there is a real conflict, and the burden of proof is on you to a large extent.

Editor's Response to Letter #667 (Part f)

Oh my goodness! Are you serious? Now the crux of your problem really comes to the fore. Your thought processes are not only out for all to see but out of kil-ter, as well. I certainly wouldn't want to have you as an attorney. My friend, anyone who doesn't read everything with a critical eye is opening himself up to agony galore. I read everything like a lawyer reading a contract and I am especially attune to contradictions, inconsistencies, conflicts with known facts, and statements that just don't fit in. That goes to the very essence of an FBI investigation. They cross check data, separate witnesses during interrogation to see if their stories conflict and make every attempt to interview more than one source or witness (as many as is feasible in fact) in order to compare as many views as is possible. You made the utterly ludicrous comment that, "If there is any way to read the text that avoids the conflict, that reading is adopted." That's no problem; that's easy. Just read one source or interrogate one person. That will certainly eliminate all conflicts between sources. All you have to do is hear or read what one source has to say while ignoring or avoiding areas or subjects of potential conflict. in his or her story.

Second, you say I "tend to read any 2 statements so that if there is a possible conflict, there is a conflict." You got that wrong too. I tend to read any 2 statements that conflict and say there is a conflict until it's resolved. I see the conflict and ask for a reconciliation; you see the conflict and say there must be a reconciliation. That is a fundamental disagreement on how to reason. Do you follow this philosophy with respect to everything in life or only when it comes to the Bible. If the former, then I fear for your prognosis. Frankly, I don't think you do. You are like so many religious people with whom I work with on a daily basis. They reason rather well regarding everyday activities but seem wholly unable to think critically when Scripture comes on the scene. You are probably like the computer programmer, aeronautical engineer, and thousands of other employees who can think logically with respect to occupational activities but are completely unable to transfer these same critical thinking skills, skills that seek out conflicts and contradictions and are so crucial to good job performance, into Scriptural analysis. It's as if you and they have a mind block, a wall, erected by the Bible in general and Jesus in particular.

Third, you accuse me of contending that, "...if there is a possible conflict, there is a conflict." and then you assert that, "This is, of course, the reverse of how one reads a text, Bible, contract, studybook, what-ever." It is? If I were unscrupulous, I'd like to sell you some insurance policies. Unethical telemarketers ought to have a field day with your number. You have left yourself open to every fraudulent activity or concept imaginable. You are going to make no attempt to detect any contradictions, conflicts, or discrepancies in what you are told until they are practically shoved down your throat. After all didn't you say, "If there is any way to read the text that avoids the conflict, that reading is adopted." Your prescription for thought scares the holy scripture out of me. I can't think of any train of reasoning that could be worse.

Fourth, you say, "Finding a possible conflict is only the first step in showing there is a real conflict" when I would be seeing little or no conflicts at all if I relied upon that approach. The chances of me finding a possible conflict are slim to none under your scenario. Most conflicts would only be discovered by happenstance rather than design, study, or critical analysis.

And finally, you add insult to injury by saying, "...the burden of proof is on you to a large extent." In other words, instead of you who are making the claim or submitting the clash proving no contradiction exists, you want me to prove it does. Talk about backward reasoning. That's like the religious fanatic who demands that I prove he is not followed by a green man whom he can plainly see. You submit two statements or accounts that are contradictory on their face and you want me to prove they are contradictory rather than you being required to provide a reconciliation. How many times do I have to say: THE BURDEN OF PROOF IS ON HE WHO ALLEGES. THAT IS THE ACHILLES HEELHEEL FOR ALL RELIGIOUS/SUPERSTITIOUS THOUGHT. In fact, it is the death knell for all unsubstantiated thought, religious or otherwise. You might just as well say that conflicts between mythology, Alice In Wonderland, Santa Claus, and The Easter Bunny on the one hand and everyday life on the other are to be accepted as reconcilable until proven otherwise. If I read two statements that are contradictory on their face, the contradiction stands until you provide a reconciliation. It does not mean there is no contradiction until I prove one exists. (To Be Continued)

Letter #669 from DMP of Bellingham, Washington

Dear Dennis. As you know, although I am a longtime B.E. subscriber, I have seldom written. (The reason I mention this is so that you will know that this is a special occasion of sorts.)

With regard to your commentary in the January, 1996 issue, there are many, many things with which I agree. I certainly agree that people can (and many do) work their way out of a religion. I agree that dialogue with religionists is not always a waste of time. I agree that before a religionist will accept what we have to offer, he must be shown the error of his ways. And I agree that presenting biblical contradictions, problems, and errors can be an effective tool.

On the other hand, you seem to place your efforts on a higher plane than that of others whose focus is different. In answer to Rowell's criticism that focusing on biblical contradictions is a waste of time, you say, "What does he suggest as a substitute: Glittering generalities, nebulous theological debates, extensive listings of biblical atrocities and immoralities, disputed historical contentions, or vague philosophizing on the nature of man's condition and the existence of some sort of divine being concerned with our welfare?" I have compiled fairly extensive lists of biblical inconsistencies, atrocities, vulgarities, absurdities, and unlikely precepts. I distribute them free, via the Internet. Why do I do this? Because these things were effective with me in helping me to become nonreligious.

I have a good friend who is very active in promoting debates and preparing nontheists for debates with theists. Why does he do this? Because this sort of thing was influential in his atheism.

Farrell Till is a friend of mine. Dan Barker is an acquaintance. As you know, both are former ministers. Their deconversion stories are somewhat different in terms of the influential factors.

The point is that there are many effective techniques for reaching religionists.

Editor's Response to Letter #669

Dear DMP. I have no quarrel with your comments. You are certainly correct. In fact, I know of people who have lost their confidence in the Bible and Christianity because of one lone verse. Not long ago I read a book in which the author said he left because Jesus claimed the mustard seed was the least of all seeds and he knew that was definitely false. There are, indeed, many roads to Rome. The real question becomes one of determining which will more likely be taken. If you can dissuade people by the approach you suggest, then by all means proceed full steam ahead. I'm certainly not going to stand in your way. In fact, I would be more than glad to help widen your path. As I told one of my atheist subscribers who travels the nation debating the existence of a god, if he finds that to be effective and influential don't quit by any means. I just don't believe that that method will reach the largest audience or pin down religionists in a manner that forestalls escape.

In addition, I don't believe you are destroying the Bible's credibility as much as you are merely highlighting its excesses. All of the topics you referred to have been discussed in BE at one time or another. But I don't see atrocities, absurdities, and vulgarities as the core about which the best strategy should revolve. Judging from what I have read in his newsletter and several phone conversations we have had over the years, I think Farrell would concur in my analysis.

An assault upon the Bible should rely upon a strategy that is far broader than what you suggest. My book, for example, covers almost the entire spectrum of biblical topics and the whole gamut of biblical dead-ends.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #670 from JS of Grosse Pointe Farms, Michigan

Dear Dennis. I have the following comment about letter #666 from CK (Issue #159). CK dredges up all kinds of arguments for why 1 Kings 7:23 and 2 Chron. 4:2 do not "prove" that pi is exactly 3.0000, when we know today that pi is approximately equal to 3.14159265358979323846264338327950. The problem with all of CK's arguments is that they only "convince" in retrospect. CK should remember that as late as 1897 (yes, 1897, only 99 years ago), the state of Indiana almost adopted House Bill 246, which would have required every textbook in the schools of that state to teach an incorrect value for pi! (Apparently JS means 3.0 in order to comply with biblical teachings--Ed.) The House of Representatives passed it unanimously 67 to 0. In the Senate, the committee on temperance (which got the bill instead of the committee on education; this because its supporters were fundamentalist Christians, of course) voted unanimously to pass it onto the full Senate.

It was only at this point that a mathematics professor raised enough stink to bury the bill; it never passed and never got to the governor's desk. Thus, as you say Dennis, thankfully, airplanes do not fall out of the sky in Indiana, nor do bridges tumble!

People like CK should be ashamed of themselves for forgetting the price paid by scientists on behalf of science. It was Holy Writ that induced Virgilius to be burned at the stake for the crime of claiming that the earth was round; it was the Bible that induced Giordano Bruno to be burned at the stake for insisting that the stars are not stationary.

And now, after-the-fact, puny brains like that of CK come along and claim that: the Bible was never wrong in the first place, if only read properly, it would be discerned that none of these passages means what it says, and that none means what they have been interpreted to mean for centuries. I'm sure all the martyrs for science are now comforted by this fact. Thank you CK. Presumably the day will come when the Bible believers will insist that the Bible does not "really" say Jesus was resurrected and Dennis McKinsey is being nit-picky when he ridicules those portions of the Good Book that claim he was!.... Keep up the good work.

Letter #671 from YW of Aspen, Colorado (Part a)

Dear Mr. McKinsey. I have been receiving Biblical Errancy since November and I really enjoy it.... I don't know Greek (I wish I did) but I know Hebrew fluently. If used to teach Hebrew to new immigrants in Israel, and, while living there, I met and befriended many missionaries, as well as Israeli and Palestinian converts to "Born Again" Christianity. I was a a teen-ager at that time, just out of high school, and I almost fell into their trap. They really seemed nice and loving at first. They wanted me to accept their view, but they hated my questions. When they realized that I was not going to be one of them, and that I had questions they just could not logically answer, they turned quite vicious. They said that I was a 'scoffer' (quoting Psalm 1 with a pasted-on smile) but all I wanted from these self-styled pillars of virtue were some good answers to the valid questions I had, instead of the pat answers they are used to giving. Even though I tried to remain friends with them, this ended-up being impossible, due to their insisting that I had become possessed by the devil. I had initially thought that they were sincere about seeking truth and hating lies, but I guess not.

One thing I noticed, which is sort-of funny, sort-of sad, and rather pathetic, is that Israeli Christians, even though they knew Hebrew fluently, often carried English Bibles as well. When discussing the key mistranslated Old Testament verses which they say prophecy about Jesus, ("The virgin shall conceive...", "They have pierced my hands and feet...." etc.), I always tried to keep them debating from the actual Hebrew Bible. Nevertheless, even though they were fluent in the original language of the book in question, whenever those verses would come up, they would pull out their KJV or NIV or some other translation. When questioned about why they did this, the "company line" that they had been programmed to say went something like "I prefer the KJV because in it the Lord brings out the true meaning of this passage so clearly." This evasion of the obvious facts in deference to proscribed dogma and doctrine, in addition to their rejection and fear of logical criticism, leads me to believe that they had no interest whatever in the truth.

Most Christians accept the Bible as the "Word of God" without ever having read it. At any Bill Graham crusade or the like, a thousand John and Jane Does will come down to the pulpit, 'accept the Lord,' and will then start reading the Bible, accepting it as all-encompassing, universal truth, without ever having previously read a word, and without bothering to verify its claims. What secular book is ever granted this honor?

Well, here are a couple of comments I wanted to make regarding the Hebrew of some passages discussed in the current issue of BE.

On page 158-5, NB tries to defend the contradiction between the 2000 baths in 1 Kings and the 3000 baths in 2 Chron., claiming that the ancient Hebrew numbering system is illogical. Although he is somewhat correct in regards to the inefficiency of the Hebrew "letters for numbers" system, when it comes to mathematics, these letter-numbers are as efficient as any other system for denoting numerical values. Either way, it is irrelevant, since in 1 Kings, in the Hebrew text, (at this point a Hebrew word which my computer can't type is inserted--Ed.)--the actual WORD "two thousand" is used, and NOT (another Hebrew word--Ed.) the number "2000". In 2 Chronicles the word three thousand is used and not the number 3000.

If NB had been as knowledgeable as he made himself out to be, he would have known that the Hebrew numbering system is only used in the Bible to mark out chapters, verses, etc. and that these markings were added much later than the actual text, in order to help readers find their place. The Bible itself spells out all numbers in words.

Regarding the word translated into "replenish" in many English translations, I would like to point out the following: The prefix "re-" implying "to (do) again" (refill, rewrite, remodel, rebuild, etc.) comes from Latin, and is a feature in all Latin languages, as well as in English, which has been greatly influenced by Latin. The Hebrew language has never had such a feature, so MT is correct when he says that the word (another Hebrew term--Ed.) means "and fill". The "-plenish" half of the word comes from the French plein, which means "full.". Since there is no equivalent to "re-" in Hebrew, and there is no such single word as "replenish," you would have to say "fill again" in Hebrew.

Editor's Response to Letter #671 (Part a)

Your observations are well taken, especially the one regarding writing out numbers with words instead of with actual numbers in Hebrew. Good point! It would be rather difficult to confuse words rather than the actual numbers.

Regarding the "replenish" issue, I have no problem with your correction. But if what you say is true then a sizable number of Hebraic translators made a major mistake. If they translated as "replenish" what you feel should have been translated as "and fill," then they erred grievously because the two are by no means equivalent. "And fill" in no way denotes a repetitive act. If the original author of the script would have said "fill again" if "replenish" were intended, then the translators of this verse blundered.

But I think you are going to have a hard time selling this to some of your compatriots because The Holy Scriptures according to the Masoretic Text published by the Jewish Publication Society of America uses the word "replenish" in both Gen. 1:28 and 9:1. And the translators of the 1901 ASV, which is considerably less political than most recent translations, uses "replenish."

Letter #671 Concludes (Part b)

Although the KJV is not copyrighted, the NIV and all those new translations are. There's big money in religion in general, and in bibles in particular, and I tend to doubt that profit-driven Bible translators who have their own agenda (and know it's all a load of crap, anyway) have really bothered to go back to the original text word-for-word. The KJV is held in very high esteem among Protestants and I'll just bet my right eyeball that an open KJV has been on the table during very recent translations. And so this mistake (and others) in the KJV have passed into subsequent translations.

Regarding "replenish," I think part of the original mistranslation in the KJV is due to the fact that in everyday speech, "filling" means the replenishing of common items, (glasses, plates, containers, etc.). When you think of it, how often does one say "Fill the world!" or "Fill something that has never been filled before!" Most items that we fill have been filled before, unless they are brand new. I guess the most common usage of the word "to fill" where it does not mean "to replenish" is in "filling a hole," and then only if the hole was there from the start. If you yourself or someone else dug the hole, you are, in fact, replenishing it.

The disturbing thing concerning the above mentioned mistranslation is this: There are Christians who have taken this mistranslation (as well as the 2 versions of creation seemingly mentioned in Genesis) and extrapolated it to mean that before our present world-order (which according to them began 5700 years ago with Adam and creation) there existed an entirely different order of being which we know nothing about. These Christians then use this very convenient contrivance to sweep under the carpet any geological discoveries that may conflict with their world-view. Thus, if the world seems to be older than 6000 or so years...it is! Dinosaurs are "dragons" that existed in this former creation. It all happened in that nebulous "pre-Adamic" world! Wow! And all this from a mistranslation of one little word!

I hope you don't mind me pointing out the above. I am somewhat of an amateur linguist, and I speak, read and write a number of languages. I hate seeing an argument not carried out to its entirety because of a simple Bible mistranslation or linguistic error. Wishing you the best, Atheistically yours.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #671 (Part b)

The issue appears to be one of deciding who is the better translator. Although you are proficient in Hebrew, YW, I'm still inclined to accept "replenish" as the more reliable translation. If I have to pick between the KJV, the ASV and the Jewish Masoretic Text on the one hand and most modern translations on the other, I'm inclined to go with the former, knowing the politics of it all. The KJV and the ASV were written when religion ruled the roost and translators didn't have to worry about critics such as myself. Nowadays things are different. This whole problem highlights a comment I made many years ago; namely, you could be the world's greatest Greek/Hebrew scholar and you'll still find experts disagreeing with your translation.

Letter #672 from JC of Corpus Christi, Texas

Dear Sir. I saw what appeared to be a good program on T.V. today, and decided to write and request more info and some literature. I did not realize that there were so many Bible errors until I tuned into your first time program.

Editor's Response to Letter #672

Dear JC. I am glad you tune in. One of our subscribers in your area is doing an excellent job of getting our tapes played on your local public access channel. We have received several requests for information from your region showing you are by no means alone. I'd mention our supporter's name, but I'm not sure he wants the publicity. He's proving very nicely that all it takes is determination and sticktuitiveness.

Letter #673 from CH of Honolulu, Hawaii

Dennis. There are several cable access stations (channels?) here that have 1/2 & 1 hour periods blank. They just show announcements or repeat the same old shows over and over.

The only Atheist program is American Atheists and it is irregular and unpredictable or repetitive. Do you provide different types regularly? I'd be glad to be a local sponsor. They actually want a local producer here, but I'm sure we can work on it!

We need something to counter the numerous and increasing "christian" programs that are filling up the cable stations. Having been brainwashed into a "christian" cult since being a teenager, it took me years to get rid of all this mental garbage!

We need to start young to prevent young people from getting involved with all this christian religious nonsense!

Editor's Response to letter #673

I couldn't agree with you more. You are singing my tune. I have been urging people since last summer to help our cause by playing our tapes in their areas. Playing tapes is effective because I receive requests for materials from people who would not go around the corner to hear any atheist, agnostic, or humanist who ever lived. As I have said so often: You have to take the message to them. They are not going to come knocking at our door, especially when they are convinced they already have the truth and nobody has shown them the error of their ways. I certainly appreciate your willingness to assist. It takes effort and is certainly not going to fall into our basket like acorns from a tree. As of now we have 46 one-half hour tapes arranged sequentially and ready for distribution.

Letter #674 from JS of Grosse Pointe Farms, Michigan

Hi Dennis.... As usual, the publication is looking better all the time. I liked your response to the nut who wanted you to print less letters of praise! In the past you did not seem to ever attack peoples' motivation, only the merits of their arguments. Now I'm glad you're adding this extra and important dimension....

Letter #675 from JS of Shoemakersville, Penn.

Thank you for your prompt reply to my inquiry regarding your publication. In the free issue you sent me you included a brief bio. You said that you weren't raised in a religious or fundamentalist environment, so you "have no ax to grind." I, unfortunately, was raised in a "Pentecostal" church, and I do have an ax to grind. I'm 36 now and the "mid-life crises" regrets of my youth are magnified even further due to the many places, people, and activities I could have experienced, but didn't, because they were "sinful" or "worldly" or "of the flesh" etc. I hope you are successful in getting your voice heard in this nation in as big a way as those speculation-dealing TV preachers. I plan to do all that I can to spread the "gospel" (good news) of self-determination (in regard to planning and pursuing one's life, instead of "seeking God's will" or "waiting on the Lord and his leading"--which in reality are all imagination-based ways of "thinking", fueled by hunches, feelings, associations, teachings, preconceived notions, prejudices and subjective/relativistic "reasonings"). I don't want to see anyone else waste their youth like I did.

I am buying your book and it will probably be my main weapon while I "fight the good fight" for truth, no matter how unpleasant it may seem when it's found.

EDITOR'S NOTE: (A) We'd like to request that all letters to the editor discussing the contents of prior letters to the editor begin with a short recapitulation of what was discussed in the prior letter. We receive too many letters in which I must spend time reintroducing our readers to prior material. Writers who start discussing something that was analyzed 1, 2, or 3 months earlier often forget that they are addressing an audience that has slept since then. Some writers are jumping into what concerns them so quickly that I don't even know what they're referring to.

(B) We would again like to ask everyone to help us by playing our video tapes on any public access stations to which they may have access. This is very important and we need as much assistance as is possible. Those who do not live in an area with public access cablevision can still get our tapes played by finding a friend or relative who does live in a public access area and then asking that person to request his or her station to play our tapes. In many instances, just getting a tape into a cable access area is sufficient. Some stations welcome them because they counterbalance all the religious propaganda that is currently flooding cable access. Where there's a will there's a way. More often than not persistence will carry the day.

A national periodical focusing on Biblical errors, contradictions, and fallacies, while providing a hearing for apologists

COMMENTARY

This issue will conclude our analysis of Haley's well known apologetic work that was last addressed in the August 1995 issue.

REVIEWS

Haley's AN EXAMINATION OF THE ALLEGED DISCREPANCIES OF THE BIBLE (Part VII)--On page 280 Haley attempts to reconcile the clash between Matt. 6:19, 25, 34 ("Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth... Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink: nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. ...Take therefore no thought for the morrow..."), Luke 12:33 ("Sell that ye have, and give alms"), and Rom. 13:14 ("Make not provision for the flesh, to fulfill the lusts thereof") on the one hand and Prov. 13:22 ("A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children") and 1 Tim. 5:8 ("But if any provide not for his own, and specifically for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel") on the other. Haley states,

"...The first text simply forbids our making earthly possessions our 'treasure,' our chief good. We must not set our hearts upon them."

The first text says nothing of the sort and nothing with respect to gradations. It says you are not to accumulate wealth; it doesn't say you can do so as long as you don't make it your "chief good."

Haley continues,

"The word 'thought' in the two texts, as in our early English literature, means solicitude, anxious care.... Hence the precept is: 'Be not unduly anxious concerning your life,' etc."

In effect, Haley has changed the meaning of the word "thought" and significantly altered the message conveyed. If it has the meaning he implies, then the translators of these verses erred grievously.

Haley then states,

"The first two texts from Luke inculcate concretely the abstract principle of benevolence, but do not sanction improvidence."

Although it would no doubt be nice from an apologetic perspective if that were true, unfortunately, "Sell that ye have, and give alms" is much too absolutist to allow that escape.

And finally Haley states,

"The text from Luke 12 has, according to Meyer, a specific application, being 'addressed only to the apostles and then existing disciples'."

This, of course, is one of the oldest of all apologetic defenses. When the Bible commands people to do something that is patently offensive or unacceptable, biblicists will allege that the instruction only applies to the people being addressed at that particular time. When the command meets their approval, it is allegedly applicable to all. Apologists have a long history of trying to apply biblical maxims they like to everyone who ever lived, while restricting those they don't like to those people being addressed way back when. It's a neat little ploy and, unfortunately, many of the unwary have succumbed to its wiles.

On page 293 Haley reads between the lines in order to blend Matt. 18:15 ("Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone....") with 1 Tim. 5:19-20 ("Against an elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses. Them that sin rebuke before all, that others also may fear"). In essence, are offenders to be reprimanded in public or in private? Haley says,

"The first text refers to private, personal wrongs, the second, to open, public offenses against peace and good order."

Where he got this idea is anybody's guess, since there certainly isn't anything in the text that would substantiate a wholly arbitrary distinction of this nature. The second says nothing about "peace and good order." All it refers to is "Them that sin" which could refer to thousands of acts having nothing to do with "peace and good order."

Haley continues by quoting the apologist Alford who says of the first text,

"This direction is only in case of personal offence against ourselves, and then the injured person is to seek private explanation, and that by going to his injurer, not waiting till he comes to apologize."

This doesn't resolve the problem because "Them that sin rebuke before all" in 1 Timothy would include those brothers who trespass against you personally and are to be rebuked privately. Moreover, there is nothing in the text that would substantiate Haley's assertion that the injured party is to seek out the injurer. Just more adding between the lines.

And finally Haley states,

"This commentator (meaning himself--Ed.), with Huther and most others, applies the second quotation to sinning presbyters or 'elders,' who are to be openly rebuked, that the whole church may fear on seeing the public disgrace consequent on sin."

This ruse would only have validity if "elders" were not "brothers." But since "elders" are included within the larger category of "brothers," then the first verse (Matt. 18:15) is referring to elders as well. When the first verse says your brother is to be rebuked in private, it means all of your brothers and that would include the elders. Yet, the second verse says elders, who are also your brothers, are to be rebuked in public, not in private.

On page 333 Haley's reconciliation of 2 Sam. 24:1 ("The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them to say, Go, number Israel and Judah") with 1 Chron. 21:1 ("And Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel") is a new low in pathetic proposals. Haley states,

"It is consistent with Hebrew modes of thought that whatever occurs in the world, under the overruling providence of God,--whatever he suffers to take place,--should be attributed to his agency. In not preventing, as he might have done, its occurrence, he is viewed as in some sense bringing about the event. Hence the act of Satan might be, in this indirect way, referred back to God, as the Governor of the universe."

I am tempted to ask myself: Does this "solution" really merit a response? If this kind of explanation were viable, then the entire infamous career of every reprobate in world history, let alone biblical figures, could be blamed on God. After all didn't Haley say,

"whatever he (God--Ed.) suffers to take place,--should be attributed to his agency. In not preventing, as he might have done, its occurrence, he is viewed as in some sense bringing about the event."

We go from blaming God for nothing to blaming him for everything. Talk about getting a bum rap!

On page 434 Haley refers to the famous biblical scene that is portrayed so vividly in the movie known as The Ten Commandments. After citing Ex. 7:20-21 ("And Moses and Aaron did so, as the Lord commanded; and he lifted up the rod, and smote the waters that were in the river...and all the waters that were in the river turned to blood. And the fish that was in the river died; and the river stank, and the Egyptians could not drink of the water of the river; and there was blood throughout all the land of Egypt.") he immediately grappled with the perplexing problem presented by verses 22 and 24 ("And the magicians of Egypt did so with their enchantments: and Pharaoh's heart was hardened, neither did he hearken unto them; as the Lord had said.... And all the Egyptians digged round about the river for water to drink; for they could not drink of the water of the river"). Cecil B. DeMille conveniently skirted the latter text because of the obvious dilemma created by the whole scene, namely: If Moses changed all the river water into blood, how could the Pharaoh's magicians have immediately followed suit by doing the same? The water was already blood, so how could it have been changed into blood by the magicians, unless it had first been restored to water. Haley would have done better if he had followed Cecil B and dodged the issue entirely instead of saying,

"We may take the word 'all,' in the 19th and 20th verses, in the loose popular sense, as implying far the greater part: the exceptions being so few and insignificant that the author overlooks them entirely. Some water remained unchanged, upon which the magicians operated, and which the Egyptians drank during the interval."

All this "explanation" amounts to is a denial by Haley that "all" means all. He would have us believe it means "nearly all." And all white horses are not white either!

Haley continues by saying,

"Kurtz thinks that only Nile water, whether in the river or in vessels, was changed, the water in the wells being unaffected."

That's true. The text does say that only the waters of the river were affected. But that doesn't solve the problem because the magicians did likewise with the same water--the Nile water. Water in the wells or other vessels is irrelevant. We are only talking about the water in the river.

And finally, Haley concludes his anemic defense by relating arguments used by two apologists. He states,

"Mr. R.S. Poole suggests that only the water that was seen was smitten, that the nation might not perish. Mr. Alexander thinks that 'the water when filtered through the earth on the bank of the river, was restored to its salubrity'. This agrees with the statement that 'all the Egyptians digged round about the river for water to drink' in verse 24."

It's a good thing that Haley says Poole "suggests" and Alexander "thinks," because that's about all their defenses amount to. Poole may "suggest" that "only the water that was seen was smitten," but that is not textually supportable. Verse 20 says "all the waters that were in the river turned to blood," not just most of it. And as far as Alexander's ploy is concerned not only is it not sustainable biblically but the entire river would have had to have been filtered almost instantaneously, since the magicians followed with their trick in quick succession.

Why doesn't Haley just skip all this "scientific" falderal and say God turned the river back into water miraculously and instantaneously. After all, since we are playing fast and loose with the preposterous anyway, why not go all out. There is no sense in trying to appear rational when the Bible is at stake.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #667 from DA Continues from Last Month (Part g)

(On page 2 of the 151st issue I quoted Eccle. 1:9 (RSV) which says, "What has been is what will be, and what has been done is what will be done; there is nothing new under the sun." Then I wanted to know how many cities had an atomic bomb dropped on them prior to 1945 and how many people walked on the moon before 1969. Rev. BB provided a weak response and DA now provides even weaker support of Rev. BB by saying),

The Rev. has it all over you. Eccle. (sic) 1:9 is essentially correct in saying "There is nothing new under the sun." Your counterexamples only work on the technical level.

Walking on the Moon is a particularly lame example. We haven't been back for 20 years now. May not be back for another 20. It got a lot of press, but what changed? Our heroic endeavors were in fact just ostentatious spending, little different from the Pyramids of Ancient Egypt. Nothing new here but the trappings.

The Atomic bomb is better, but what is unique about it? Never been used before...? True of any weapon for some date or another. A new way to fight a war? True of all sorts of weapons. (The stirrup did wonders for calvery (sic). Gunpowder crunched it, as well as castles. & the airplane did quite a bit too.) Uniqueness lies in how it did it? Also true of all these other weapons....

Editor's Response to Letter #667 (Part g)

You have an amazing facility for focusing on the irrelevant, DA. Eccle. 1:9 doesn't just have it all over you; it's walking on you as well. What does the technical aspect have to do with anything?. Did anyone ever walk on the moon prior to 1969? Yes or no? They either did or they did not. There is no in-between. If they did, then my example is worthless. If they did not, then your explanation is worthless. The lengths to which you apologists will go to defend the indefensible are truly awesome. It is disconcerting to think that we even have to share the same general geographical area with people whose thinking processes are so completely divorced from reality and utterly tendentious.

And who cares how many times we have been back since 1969? That's irrelevant and immaterial also. You say, "It got a lot of press, but what changed?" I just told you what changed. Don't you even try to listen? There is none so deaf as he who won't hear! For the first time in history man set foot on the moon. That's what's new! That's what changed!

Then you say, "Our heroic endeavors were in fact just ostentatious spending little different from the Pyramids of Ancient Egypt." With all due respect, we are again being showered with more of your irrelevant drivel. What do motives have to do with the issue? I don't care why they went to the moon; the fact is they went, and that's what counts.

As far as your atom bomb explanation is concerned, you appear to have switched sides and joined sanity. What position are you trumpeting? Instead of proving the atomic bomb was not unique, you merely allege that uniqueness is initially applicable to every weapon that has been devised. You say that is "True of any weapon for some date or another." Specifically you refer to gun powder, castles, airplanes and stirrups. Precisely! At some time or other they were all new; so I rest my case. Thanks for making it for me. I'm glad you saw the light.

(At this point DA submitted 3 paragraphs that are so rambling, incoherent, and immaterial that it is simply not worth putting our readers through the agony of trying to decipher the mess.)

Letter #667 Continues (Part h)

(On page 4 in the 151st Issue I responded to Rev. BB by saying, "Whether or not God created evil bears directly on his character which, in turn, impacts on the validity and reliability of everything contained in what is supposedly his book. Stated differently, how could a book be perfect, if it arose from an imperfect, evil-creating author?" DA responded by saying--Ed.),

How could a book be perfect, if it arose from an imperfect, evil-creating author? Several ways. You are assuming that evil-creating is an imperfection, which it often is from our biased view. That it is from a perfect view is by no means clear. A painting can easily depict evil without that being deemed a flaw, just as the painting can be flawed without depicting evil....

Editor's Response to Letter #667 (Part h)

Your comparison is not analogous because the painting is a result; not a cause. The painting did not create anything. It did not create the evil depicted in it any more than the evil depicted in it created the painting. The painting and the evil within were created together, unlike God and evil which are supposed to be completely independent. You say, "A painting can easily depict evil without that being deemed a flaw...." That's just it. The painting is depicting evil; it is not creating it, as God allegedly is. And the painting is not alleged to be perfect as God is alleged to be.

One of the most serious mistakes made by all religionists, and you are a prime example of same, is that they try to act logical to prove the illogical. Many, especially those in the ultra fundamentalist camp, occasionally go so far as to try to sound logical in order to prove that reason is a nearly worthless medium to rely upon when it comes to analyzing the crucial issues of life. This really came home to me when I read Peter Ruckman's book entitled Science and Philosophy. I have never read a book before or since that is so thoroughly anti-intellectual and worthy of the fires of Gehenna. Putting its philosophy into the minds of our youth would be like deadening their cranial nerves to all extra-sensory data--a kind of bloodless lobotomy. Using reason to disprove reason is about as feasible as using water to wash away wetness.

Letter #667 Continues (Part i)

(In the same response I stated Biblical Errancy has never propounded any kind of theology, since the very phrase "logical theology" is an oxymoron. Our philosophy is based on logic and proof; whereas, theology is based on hope and theory. DA responded by saying--Ed.),

In point of fact, BE has (propounded a theology--Ed.), at great length and with more vigor than logic. You can't help it when you propound (sic) on religious topics. A negative theology is still a theology. The distinction ("our philosophy" "theology") is flawed. Theology is a subpart of philosophy, not something in opposition to it.

Editor's Response to Letter #667 (Part i)

Your poor reasoning skills and non sequiturs never cease to amaze me, DA. That makes about as much sense as saying to me, after I have spent a solid hour denouncing fascism in every way imaginable, "Oh, then obviously you must believe in fascism." Apparently you are unable to distinguish a "negative theology" from a negative view of theology. It is not a matter of me having a theology that is essentially negative; it is a matter of me rejecting theology, period. Are you so religiously imbibed that you can't see a major distinction?

And because I said "Our philosophy is based on logic and proof; whereas, theology is based on hope and theory" you try to suck me into your religious swamp by saying "The distinction ("our philosophy" "theology") is flawed. Theology is a subpart of philosophy, not something in opposition to it."

We are not talking about philosophy in general because many philosophies are as illogical as theology. We are discussing BE's philosophy in particular, and it is based on logic and proof. In so far as the latter are concerned, theology is a subpart of that wing of philosophy which has little to do with either logic or proof.

Letter #667 Continues (Part j)

(While asking for assistance in playing our tapes, I said, "I have never received any negative feedback, except for some textual comments." In his on-going insidious attempt to undermine this publication and promote its discontinuation DA says--Ed.),

In that case, why bother? The rule of thumb is that if you are not criticized for what you say, you didn't say much. You are arguing here how useful these tapes will be, but your argument in fact suggests they are worthless.

Editor's Response to Letter #667 (Part j)

As usual you got out of my comments whatever suited your purposes and discarded the remainder. What did I say? I said I received negative textual comments and that's more than enough to justify our programs and refute your accusation.

Even more importantly, you say, "The rule of thumb is...." Where did you get that rule? No doubt it's your own creation, since a paucity of criticisms could very well be attributable to the accuracy and invulnerability of the points presented.

And most importantly of all, if you had read the article with greater concern for precision and less for revision, you would have noticed that the entire context of my observations had reference to serious threats and reprisals, not textual, scriptural, or inerrancy matters. But, of course, in true apologetic style you chose to distort as you deemed fit. After all, why be concerned about truth when the credibility of the Bible and Jesus are at stake. Cause supersedes candor.

Letter #667 Continues (Part k)

(On page 3 in the 152nd Issue I noted the conflict between Jesus' comment in Matt. 28:19 ("Go ye therefore and teach all nations baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost") and Paul's assertion in 1 Cor. 1:14, 17 ("I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius. ...For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel"). DA seeks to reconcile this contradiction by saying--Ed.)

There's a conflict? Paul was not present at Matt. 28 and thus you are under the burden of showing that Paul was in fact ordered to baptize. & context also argues against any conflict here. Paul did baptize a little, but he insists he has other duties. & he is thankful he did not baptize more because he fears that might have caused a division in the church.

Editor's Response to Letter #667 (Part k)

It was all I could do to keep from laughing at this reply, DA. So Paul was not present at Matt. 28? Well, I, along with millions of others, wasn't with Moses on Mt. Sinai or with Jesus when he delivered the Sermon on the Mount, so I guess that relieves us of those responsibilities. Don't you think any further ahead than the next sentence?

Then you compounded this nonsense by saying I am under "the burden of showing that Paul was in fact ordered to baptize." What did Jesus say? He told his followers to go and baptize. And who was a more prominent follower of Jesus than Paul?

Context does not abolish the problem by any means. If anything it compounds your dilemma. You contend "Paul did baptize a little" when Paul says in the very verse you are trying to reconcile that Jesus sent him not to baptize. All you are doing is proving that Paul directly defied a specific command of Jesus. And you only bury Paul further by saying Paul "is thankful he did not baptize more" which clearly violates what Jesus ordered. With friends like you Paul need not seek opponents.

As far as having other duties or causing division in the church is concerned, Jesus did not allow for baptismal exceptions in those instances. Where are they delineated in the script? And how do you know Paul was afraid he would divide the church by baptizing? Would you be so kind as to cite chapter and verse for that observation as well?

Letter #667 Concludes (Part I)

(On page 3 of the 152nd Issue I said, "For justice to exist, punishment must fit the crime. No matter how many bad deeds one commits in this world, there is a limit. Yet, hell's punishment is infinitely greater. There is nothing someone could do in the short space of 80 or 90 years that could possibly warrant eternal punishment." DA replies by saying--Ed.),

Quite wrong. One can argue that being stir-fried for the entire period is excessive for winking at a pretty girl, but the mere fact the "crime" happens in a finite period while the punishment is eternal is fully consistent with justice. The simple example is putting money in the bank, or loaning it. The interest on it goes on forever (at least in theory), so you eventually pay or receive an infinite amount of money for a merely finite sum....

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #667 (Part I)

You ought to be in comedy because this is another chuckle-generating reply. I enjoy some of your rationalizations because of the unintended sense of humor attached.

Since when does a crime earn interest? The punishment is to fit the crime, not infinitely exceed it. There is no analogy here whatever. In fact, precisely the opposite is true. For punishment to match the crime, it must be tailored to, and be as specific as, the crime. In no sense can the punishment surpass the crime if justice is to prevail.

As far as your reference to money is concerned, punishment is not administered by signing a blank check in which the amount is to be filled in later. I can only pity any defendant who comes into court and sees you on the bench. He might as well forget about justice. With biblicism presiding, the only thumb involved will be the one under which the defendant is placed.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #676 from JW of Hialeah, Florida

Dear Dennis. In your debate about the parable (or not) of Luke 19:27, you wrote, "If, in fact, Jesus told people to bring his enemies before him and slay them, his decency and humanity, indeed his credibility itself, is dealt a staggering blow."

I do not understand your conjecture. It appears demonstrably clear that if we take it as a parable, Jesus becomes far more atrocious, his decency even more questionable in view of a parable lesson. The credibility of his morals yields a far more staggering blow to Christendom's ethic.

The intent of a NT parable aims at teaching a lesson that its beholders should take seriously. If not, what should we make of the parable about the Good Samaritan where Jesus ends by saying "Go, and do thou likewise" (Lk. 10:37)? Or the parable about the lost coin in Lk. 15:8-10)? Should we chalk up any of Jesus' parables to, "Oh, it's just a parable, we shouldn't take it seriously"? The Parable of the Ten Pounds aims to teach a lesson about disobeying your "Nobleman" (obviously Jesus meant to put himself as nobleman). Believers can replace "servants" with themselves or someone else, but what could they possibly replace for the conclusion of the lesson: "slay them before me"?

"Slay" means to kill by violent means. Representing "slay" with "kill," "slaughter," "exterminate," "put-down," etc., certainly does not lessen the end result to the enemy.

One could not use milder concepts like "punish" because "punish" and "slay" mean entirely different things. It would also damage Jesus' credibility to suggest that he did not choose the proper parable idea to convey his intent. If he meant "punish" he could have chosen "chastise" or "discipline." etc. But he did not.

If, instead, we take Luke 19:27 as literal instead of parable, then the slaying would have to occur in front of Jesus during his limited physical life. After he died on the cross, an apologist could claim the slayings should have ended at his death. But, as parable, it transcends the physical. It becomes transcendent to Jesus who no longer lives in the physical realm. His presence resides in heaven and in the hearts and souls of all believers. The Bible has a clear message as to where "before me" occurs. For followers to accept the lesson of their Jesus, they would have to slay their enemies before Jesus where He resides in their soul or in heaven! No wonder the Inquisitions and the Crusades occurred.

"Kill them all. God will recognize his own."--said by Arnald-Amalric, 1208 (when asked by the Crusaders what to do with the citizens of Beziers who were a mixture of Catholics and Cathars)....

If we take the entire Bible in context, Jesus' parable certainly agrees with the ordering of slayings by God in the OT. If you add the concept of the Trinity, then you connect Jesus directly with all the slayings of men, women, and children by God-Jesus Almighty. Furthermore, the NT, unmistakably, has Jesus admitting to willful slaying: "I will strike her children dead." (Jesus in Rev. 2:23 NRSV). Certainly Christians should not doubt the will of Jesus, should they?

If an apologist wishes to back out of this problem by saying that Jesus did not intend to put himself as the target of the Nobleman, then the parable becomes even more atrocious. We can then put any "Noblemen" in this context. Imagine dragging the unlawful up to President Clinton and slaying them at his feet; or putting yourself in place of the nobleman and ordering your followers to slay your enemies. No matter which way a believer tries to extricate himself from this difficulty, parable or not, it leads to problems. The only out comes from (asserting--Ed.) that Jesus did not say those words and, indeed, the Bible errs, or perhaps the Christian religion bases itself on unsupported conjectures and deceptions and relies on faith instead of reason and evidence.

Letter #677 from GN of Washington D.C.

Dear Dennis.... I admire you as a person who uses logic and analysis rather than myths and fairy tales to prove his points.... If I am trying to discount the Bible as a book of lies, how would I go about doing so if the Christian I am debating agrees that the Bible is not perfect? Could you give me more verses that show the Bible to be the inerrant word of God? Some claim that the Bible is merely man's work, inspired by God. Thank you again for your kindness and help.

Editor's Response to Letter #677

Dear GN. Good question! Essentially you are asking me how one should debate liberal Christians or those who do not look upon the Bible as inerrant. As I mentioned long ago, once people leave biblical inerrancy, they can journey down many paths. Before you can expose all of the problems associated with their new approach, you must first determine where they are. Find out if they believe in the Resurrection, Original Sin, the Atonement, the Trinity, miracles, etc. You have to get a feel for their theological and biblical philosophy before you can reveal their new problems. Liberals are all over the place ideologically. So I would be foolish, indeed, if I tried to provide a comprehensive blueprint encompassing all facets of liberal Christian beliefs. During a radio interview many years ago, the host, a United Church of Christ minister, supported me so much that I couldn't help but wonder why he was a minister of the gospel at all. He not only repeatedly backed me up but provided additional information to buttress my points. I am told by those in a position to know that churches and seminaries have many people of like mind. During a TV debate with a catholic priest several years ago, he agreed with so many comments our side made with respect to the Bible that I was tempted to invite him over to sit at our table. Among other things he admitted the book contained fables and folklore and could not be considered inerrant.

As far as specific verses alleging the Bible is inerrant are concerned, 2 Tim. 3:16, 2 Peter 1:21, John 10:35, 1 Cor. 2:13, and John 16:13 are among those most often cited by biblicists. Only the first two, however, are worthy of serious consideration.

Issue #163 Editor: Dennis McKinsey

July 1996

A national periodical focusing on Biblical errors, contradictions, and fallacies, while providing a hearing for apologists

REVIEWS

In the Spring Issue of the Christian Research Journal fundamentalist professor Gleason Archer attacked my book in an article entitled A Summary Critique. This prompted us to devote the entire April 1996 issue to a critique of his analysis accompanied by a written reply which we sent to the Christian Research Institute. We were told by CRI that our response could be no longer than 200 words, although Archer's article was at least 10 times as long. We reluctantly complied and published our entire reply verbatim in our April issue. Unfortunately, the CRI editorial staff chose to omit the last part of my reply which stated: "

For those who really desire to know the facts by reading the most comprehensive refutation of the Bible available, I strongly recommend that they not only obtain a copy of The ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BIBLICAL ERRANCY from either myself or Prometheus Press but a copy of the April issue of our periodical as well. We can be reached at 2500 Punderson Drive, Hilliard, Ohio 43026 (614) 527-1703."

In effect, they chose to delete just about anything that would give CRI readers a fix on our location. But just as questionable is the fact that they sent a copy of my reply to Archer and allowed him to insert an answer to my brief response. In other words, he was given exclusive access to my reply and provided time to write a response. Apparently CRI feels my articles should not be allowed to appear unopposed. When I called CRI to register my disgruntlement and request an opportunity to respond to what Archer said with respect to my observations, I was told by the Managing Editor, Ms. Cogdill, that the dialogue between me and Archer was over as far as CRI's Journal was concerned and that if I wished to converse with him any further I could call his home. I told her that I did not think it was fair for me to be denied an opportunity to reply and she said that their policy has nearly always been to terminate dialogues after the initial responses.

The bottom line is that Archer gets the last word even though he began our exchange. Since he accused my book of being inaccurate in spots, it would only be fair if I were given the last word. After all, isn't the defendant allowed to speak last in a court of law. So Archer spoke first and Archer spoke last and I was allowed to inject whatever I could.

Some readers are probably curious as to what Archer said that irks my ire; so for their benefit here is his verbatim closing statement. "I can hardly be accused of refusing to touch the arguments found in McKinsey's book, since--as I noted at the end of my review--I have produced an encyclopedia of my own (An Encyclopedia of Bible Difficulties) that addresses a whole host of those very arguments. Therefore having dealt with such questions at much greater length in book form than I could possibly do in a brief book review, I chose rather to focus on what I consider most noteworthy about McKinsey's treatment of the Bible: his total failure to grapple with the absolutely conclusive evidence of hundreds of fulfilled prophecies that--along with other aspects of the biblical record--demonstrate God's complete control of the sweep of history from beginning to end. This evidence completely excludes the possibility of mere human genius in foretelling the future."

Archer's response is deficient in two major respects. First, he says, "I can hardly be accused of refusing to touch the arguments found in McKinsey's book, since--as I noted at the end of my review--I have produced an encyclopedia of my own." In truth, his book barely begins to cope with the incredible number of problems contained within the Bible. Those who doubt the veracity of this observation need only read his work and compare its contents with that which appears in mine.

Anyone who is reasonably well acquainted with my book and this publication should know that I have never focused on individual points or any set of particular points to destroy the Bible's credibility. Certainly not! That approach would open me up to such charges as "taking out of context," "ignoring copyist errors," "being too natural," interpreting too literally, being too petty, failing to take account of the cultural milieu of that era, etc. Instead, our approach has always been one of simply burying the opposition in a mountain, an avalanche, a veritable tidal wave of information. The great volume, the sheer magnitude, the overwhelming mass of our evidence is more than enough to dissuade all but intransigent ideologues desperately grasping for supposes, surmises, and suppositions.

Secondly, Archer alleges I failed to "grapple with the absolutely conclusive evidence of hundreds of fulfilled prophecies." Not only does Archer fail to mention the fact that most of the prophecies which he cites to demonstrate biblical prescience were shown to be unreliable in my Encyclopedia, but he neglects to note that the entire 15th chapter of my book is devoted to nothing but an exposure of predictions that landed wide of the mark. Apparently he is willing to concede, or does not wish to contest, the accuracy of my observations, but feels they are somehow overshadowed by a number of accurate predictions. I can only assume that he is operating on the premise that a good batting average is sufficient to substantiate perfection. The problem with this approach is that it not only fails to disprove what I have shown but fails to prove what he is alleging. Hardly a formula for perfection! I demonstrated why the prophecies I discussed are deficient, while he failed to corroborate any of his examples. Merely saying they are true doesn't make it so. Even if his prophecies were valid, which they most assuredly are not, the Book would still be far from inerrant and divinely inspired. Until all of the examples mentioned in my book and this newsletter are shown to be invalid, biblical inerrancy will remain a myth. If Archer feels I did not submit a sufficiently large number of bogus prophecies, then he should register his complaint with my publisher. I would have been more than glad to exhaust my reservoir of relevant data, but the book's editors would never have sent a volume of that size to the printer because of the cost involved. In classic apologetic style Archer is desperately trying to focus on those aspects of the Bible which he deems strongest while trying to ignore those parts that are either blatantly false or too weak to defend. And anyone who has done his homework with a reasonable degree of critical analysis and open-mindedness knows that the latter encompass a tremendous percentage of the entire text. People selling something naturally gravitate toward the positive aspects of their product and eschew the negative. That is endemic to all sales.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #678 from MT of Anaheim, California (Part a)

Thank you for your answers in February's edition of Biblical Errancy. If we may continue the dialogue, that would be greatly appreciated....

On page 146 (of your book--Ed.) you state that John 20:9 refers to Jesus rising twice, since it uses the words "he must rise again from the dead." I've consulted other translations, and a Greek interlinear, and the word "again" is not present. If it's only an error in the translation within the KJV, then there's not really an error in the Bible, is there? If this is the case, why didn't you mention this in your book?

Editor's Response to Letter #678 (Part a)

One of the most common errors made by apologetic critics of the King James is their failure to compare it with other versions of Scripture. Rarely is this version out on a limb all by its lonesome as is so commonly alledged by many biblicists. You say you consulted a Greek interlinear and other translations, but did you read the American Standard Version of 1901 or the Bible in Basic English or the Living Bible of 1971 or the New American Standard Version of 1977. As the teen-agers of today would say, I think not. All have the word "again." The ASV and the NASB are especially powerful support for the King James. So now it becomes a question of whose source is more authoritative. Remember what I said long ago? You could be the world's greatest Greek/Hebrew scholar and still find experts disagreeing with your interpretation. If you press your point, instead of reconciling the problem, you will only succeed in proving the verse needs to be expunged from the Bible. That's the best you can hope for. The sentence becomes worthless, because you don't know how it should be translated. And if you purge John 20:9 from the Bible because of diametrically opposed translations, you are going to play havoc with a sizable portion of the entire book. Literally hundreds of verses are translated oppositely by different versions of Scripture. A competitive struggle pitting my scholars and versions against your scholars and versions will encompass the whole enterprise. And in all of this chaos the layman will be left hanging.

Letter #678 Continues (Part b)

Also, on page 297 of your book--The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy--, you state that Ezek. 29:15 contains a false prophecy. The text says "Egypt shall be the basest of the kingdoms, and neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations; for I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule over the nations." Technically, this is not a false prophecy. First off, your saying that Egypt ruled over the Sudan is saying

Egypt ruled over a single nation. The prophecy says that they shall no more rule over the nations, plural.

Editor's Response to Letter #678 (Part b)

Aside from the fact that your "first off" is also your "last off," I am having some difficulty understanding why more than one nation is needed. I interpret the verse as saying that Egypt will never again exalt itself over any other nation and by using the word "nations" it means all nations. If your interpretation were correct, then why would the text say "they shall no more rule over the nations," when they never ruled over the "nations," (plural) to begin with. Of course, if you know of several nations Egypt ruled, then by all means speak up. If you do, however, please be fully cognizant of the fact that that will destroy your original thesis that Egypt did not rule over other nations (plural).

Letter #678 Continues (Part c)

On page 303, you make a point about the "rivers of Egypt" in Ezekiel 30:4-16 being a problem. Could this text possibly mean the tributaries of Egypt, within the delta of the Nile? Was there a Hebrew word for tributaries.

Editor's Response to Letter #678 (Part c)

How could you have tributaries within the delta of the Nile. Webster defines a tributary as a stream flowing into a larger one. Water in the delta would be the Nile's own water flowing into the Mediterranean by many channels. Those aren't tributaries.

Secondly, you are asking me if there is a Hebrew word for tributaries? If you will excuse me for saying so, MT, you appear to be on a fishing expedition. You want me to provide you with information to prove your case. You, not I, are obligated to prove there is a Hebrew word for tributaries and, far more importantly, prove that the Nile had tributaries in Egypt.

And finally, even if there were some streams flowing into the Egyptian Nile, you must prove they are rivers, not mere rivulets. A small creek no bigger than a ditch does not constitute a tributary. You have a whole heap of proving to do my friend.

Letter #678 Continues (Part d)

Also, you state other prophecies and claim that they are false, yet their future fulfillment is still possible. For instance, on page 304, in your sixth point, you state there's a false prophecy. What prevents this prophecy from being fulfilled in the future? How do you know that it's false, merely because it hasn't occurred yet? The same goes with points nine, ten and eleven.

Editor's Response to Letter #678 (Part d)

You seem to be saying that the prophecies you are referring to could more accurately be called unfulfilled, rather than false, prophecies. That would be a valid observation if it were not for the fact that you neglected to note my introduction to this material at the bottom of page 303. I stated, "The third and final category of prophecies are those that have never materialized. Some biblicists, such as those in the Church of Christ, contend that all the prophecies in the OT have already been fulfilled. If so, one cannot help but ask when the following, which have little or no possibility of being fulfilled, occurred." These prophecies were discussed because some biblicists contend they have already been fulfilled. Therefore, in so far as these biblicists are concerned they are false since they haven't occurred.

Letter #678 Concludes (Part e)

I'm not an inerrantist, nor am I a Christian, although at one time I was a Fundamentalist type. Right now, I'm agnostic, and though I found many good points in your book, I also found these things as being inaccurate. Thank you in advance for your response.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #678 (Part e)

Instead of giving me an opportunity to explain these suspected difficulties, you summarized to the jury by saying, "I also found these things as being inaccurate." Always consult both sides before drawing your conclusions. If you had done so, I don't think you would have been so anxious to rush to judgment.

Letter #679 from NB of Tucson, Arizona (Part a)

Dear Dennis. I have some comments re your comments on me in BE #161, but first I'd note that it ill behooves someone to accuse another of "transparent sophistries", when that someone writes sentences like, "My friend, anyone who doesn't read everything with a critical eye is opening themselves (sic) up to agony galore (p. 161-2, response to Letter #667): You claim to know a lot of Hebrew and Greek, but did you ever learn elementary English grammar?

Editor's Response to Letter #679 (Part a)

Your correction of my sentence is duly noted, but did it have to be done in such a derogatory manner? We have made proofreading errors in the past and will probably do so again. We aren't perfect and have never claimed to be such. Speaking of someone accusing others of being imperfect, when did I ever say that I "know a lot of Hebrew and Greek"? Could you cite chapter and verse for that observation? Now who is being imperfect? I have never engaged in the linguistic approach because it is not going to bear anywhere near the amount of fruit its supporters anticipate. Remember what I said about being the world's greatest Greek/Hebrew scholar?

Letter #679 Continues (Part b)

In re your comments on me in the middle of the right-hand column of page 161-4, you still haven't corrected the incorrect citations you gave for 1 Kings and 2 Chronicles in BE #158-5, but I'll let that pass. If you don't know the distinction between a singular and a plural English pronoun, I guess it's too much to ask that you correctly give the correct Biblical reference when you comment on my letter.

Editor's Response to Letter #679 (Part b)

I think the wound on your ego accounts for more of these corrections than anything else. You say I "still haven't corrected the incorrect citations" I gave for 1 Kings and 2 Chronicles in BE #158-5." To begin with, this is the first time it has come to my attention.

Secondly, in so far as I can determine only one mistake is involved. Second Chronicles 45:5 should have been 2 Chron. 4:5. Where are the incorrect "citations" (plural).

Letter #679 Continues (Part c)

...Back to page 161-4, whether or not the numbers in Hebrew were spelled out or not, you failed to note that 1 Kings 7:26, which makes the "2000-bath" assertion, is missing altogether from the Septuagint. You might at least have commented on why the Jewish scholars who compiled the Septuagint chose to omit this verse from the older texts. You didn't.

Editor's Response to Letter #679 (Part c)

The Septuagint is nothing more than a translation like the King James, the NASB and hundreds of other versions. If I make this kind of notation with respect to the Septuagint, I might as well make it with respect to hundreds of others as well. Where would this stop? Are you saying the Septuagint is somehow more authoritative than any other translation and deserves special consideration? If so, upon what basis are you making this judgment? The reference to 2,000 baths is in the Jewish Masoretic Text. Should I have noted that?

Letter #679 Continues (Part d)

Now, how about 1 Cor. 10:8, in which Paul said (NIV): "We should not commit sexual immorality, as some of them did--and in one day twenty-three thousand of them died". The reference is to Num. 25:9, which says: "but those who died in the plague numbered 24,000" ...Some interpreters have tried to reconcile this by asserting that 23,000 was the number of those who died "in one day", while the total number of deaths in the plague was 24,000. It hardly seems like that if "only" 24,000 people died "in the plague", then 23,000 of them would have died "in one day". You may have commented on this in some previous issue of BE, but if so, I am not aware of it. In any case, would you say that Paul couldn't read the Hebrew (even though he wrote in Greek, so as to reach his audience-the Corinthians-directly)? Or might it just be possible that even in transcribing Hebrew numbers, spelled out or not, some confusion might have occurred over the centuries as to which Hebrew letter was meant?

Editor's Response to Letter #679 (Part d)

You are supporting my observation, NB, when you say that "It hardly seems like that if 'only' 24,000 people died 'in the plague', then 23,000 of them would have died 'in one day'." I made that very point many moons ago. Welcome to the world of sensibleness.

As far as the initial part of your "explanation" is concerned you appear to be justifying a contradiction rather than reconciling it. If Paul made a mistake because he couldn't read Hebrew, then that's his problem, not that of his critics, and he's destroyed biblical inerrancy.

The second part of your explanation is nothing more than an exhumation of the old copyist defense which has been covered ad nauseum in prior issues. I would urge you to read the back issues of BE that focus on this ploy and effectively decimate its viability.

Letter #679 Continues (Part e)

Also, what then about Ezra 2 and Nehemiah 6? The NIV uses Arabic numerals for both of these, and some differences between these has been noted. Hardly strange, considering that the latter was written about a century after the former. There are many numbers involved here, and I have never claimed that the scribes, who were responsible for copying the manuscripts and making sure that the copies were correct, were divinely protected from error, as the Roman Catholic Church claims of the Pope when he speaks on a matter of faith and morals. So it is quite possible that (to use the passive voice so favored of Washington bureaucrats) "mistakes were made".

Editor's Response to Letter #679 (Part e)

Remember when you said, " If you don't know the distinction between a singular and a plural English pronoun, I guess it's too much to ask that you correctly give the correct Biblical reference when you comment on my letter?" Well, then, is it too much to ask that I request the same accuracy of you? After all, turn about is fair play. The conflicts to which you are referring are between Ezra 2 and Neh. 7 not Ezra 2 and Neh. 6. You'd do well to heed your own advice.

Secondly, as far as Nehemiah being written about 100 years after Ezra is concerned, that would be of no consequence if it were a thousand years. The fact is that the numbers are contradictory and they remain contradictory until you can prove that that is not how they were originally written. And how can you find out if they were written that way in the original? You can't, because the original no longer exists. You are relying very heavily upon the copyist defense and it is not going to bail out the leaking lifeboat if that is what you are counting on.

If, on the other hand, you concede that one of the figures is false and should be changed so as to match the other, then you are faced with the impossibility of deciding which is the incorrect figure. Your only possible escape is to expunge both verses from the Bible because they are contradictory and you have no way of telling which is correct. And, as I told MT earlier, if all conflicting verses are treated in this manner, then you are going to have to expunge, delete, and destroy a sizable portion of the entire Book. The purge will be awesome. If you decide to take this path, I would strongly recommend reading all 162 issues of this publication to find what needs to be eliminated. Happy researching and be sure to buy plenty of No-Doze.

Letter #679 Concludes (Part f)

Anyway to assert that everything in the Bible is false because there is a discrepancy between 2000 and 3000 "baths" is like saying that the Titanic had a problem with a few of its rivets.

Well, at least, you credit me with being "somewhat correct". I wonder if that's something like being "somewhat pregnant"?

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #679 (Part f)

I would challenge you to show me anywhere in the entire history of this periodical that I ever asserted "that everything in the Bible is false because there is a discrepancy between 2000 and 3000 'baths'" ? With all due respect, NB, that comment reeks with ignorance. Who on earth with a scintilla of sanity would say that an entire book is false because one contradiction is contained therein?

Moreover, you definitely need to read what I said in the first column of page 2 of this issue regarding Archer's attack on my response to him. Remember my reference to words like "avalanche," "mountain," and "tidal wave"?

The problem with the Titanic was not the absence of a few rivets but the removal of much of an entire side. And that is about the same condition in which the Bible finds itself. Nearly one half of the book is destroying the validity of the other half.

And finally you say, "I wonder if that's something like being 'somewhat pregnant'?" No, it's more like being somewhat healthy. Some organs feel fine while many you feel like doing without.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #680 from SB of Los Angeles, California

Dear Dennis. ...I hope to eventually read all the back issues as I have the time. As I mentioned in an earlier letter, I am a recent convert to a religion-free life. I now subscribe to several free-thinking newsletters and believe BE is by far the most informative, direct, and focused in exposing the Bible for the absurd nonsense that it is.

Editor's Response to Letter #680

Dear SB. We appreciate your generous comments and would suggest that you also look into The Skeptical Review which is published by a gentleman and a scholar, former fundamentalist preacher Farrell Till (P.O. Box 707 Canton, Illinois 61520-0717 (309) 647-4764. It is an excellent critique of the Bible that adheres to a format very similar to ours.

Letter #681 from WB of Waterloo, Iowa

Dear Mr. McKinsey.... A little commentary: One is always being told that god is omniscient. If this is so, then wouldn't this imply that everything has already happened, being it is knowable? Would this not reduce us to a trolley car status in that we can only go where the track leads and that no decision was actually made by us? In effect, the movie has already been made, all dialogue has been said, all actions completed.

Editor's Response to Letter #681

Dear WB. You are relating the old free will versus determinism problem which I struggled with for so many years as a youngster. It is not only an inescapable enigma as long as one postulates a god but a dilemma without a resolution. I don't think, however, that it means everything has already occurred, only that what will occur has already been fixed.

Letter #682 from DW of Saskatoon, Canada

Dear Mr. McKinsey. A friend loaned me your Biblical Errancy tapes (the first five?) which I have copied. Would you grant me permission to try to get them shown on the local television station? They are excellent and should be shared with the community.

At the risk of being considered critical of such excellent tapes, do you have an index for these tapes. It would be so handy to refer to various topics like Noah's Ark or the controversial coming of Christ without having to go through the whole collection again. If such reference is available, I would be pleased to reimburse you for sending it to me. Please send me your newsletter and I would be happy to subscribe.

I see in one of your tapes that you do not consider yourself an atheist. At the risk of quibbling, and this is just a quibble, do you consider yourself an atheist as far as the tooth fairy goes. If you don't believe either story, what is the difference? While I will entertain any evidence for a divine entity, I order my life as if there were none and, hence, for me an atheist is the correct label for a person who does that. Thank you again for your excellent work. I hope to hear from you soon.

Editor's Response to Letter #682

Dear DW. Your compliments are most appreciated. As far as playing our video tapes is concerned, you not only have my permission but my encouragement. By all means proceed as you deem appropriate.

As of now we have no index of our tapes, but I intend to compile one eventually.

Although your question with respect to atheism is somewhat nebulous, I think you are asking me if I put God in the same category as the tooth-fairy. My position on the existence of an alleged God has been stated many times. Those who bring up the idea are obligated to prove its valid; I am not required to prove it's not. And until evidence is forthcoming, there is no reason to place any reliance on its reality. Unlike most atheists, I am not saying there is no god; all I am saying is that theists have not proved there is.

Letter #683 from DW of Trotwood, Ohio

Please send me all information available about your Wednesday TV series Biblical Errancy Commentary. Are reprints of the programs available? I enjoy your TV program very much.

Editor's Response to Letter #683

Dear DW. You are living proof that our TV programs are not only needed and effective but are reaching people who would not otherwise be aware of the tremendous number of problems within the Bible. People such as yourself prove that our programs should be played in as many areas as is possible. All we need are those willing to help. I suspect that more people are viewing our programs than we realize, although that does not necessarily mean they agree with everything being said. But they are willing to give us a hearing and at this stage of the game that's progress.

EDITOR'S NOTE: While driving in my car several weeks ago I happened to hear a report on National Public Radio that Florida's governor was about to make a decision regarding prayer in the state's schools. Because that is a rather common occurrence these days, I didn't find that nearly as disturbing as a subsequent comment made by one of the leaders of the Christian Coalition. While explaining his position he said, "The Constitution provides freedom of religion BUT NOT FREEDOM FROM RELIGION." Normally I don't comment on extrabiblical current affairs but that statement is just too sinister, too potent, too revealing, to allow to proceed unchallenged. If that is the philosophy that is gaining ascendancy among the nation's fundamentalists and evangelicals, then the seriousness of what we have been saying over the years and the importance of this publication are undoubtedly being borne out. That is religion on the offensive, make no mistake about it. That is a sophisticated and surreptitious way of saying, "You are going to have religion in general and the Bible in particular crammed down your throats whether you like it or not." Perhaps the spokesperson for the Christian Coalition was only speaking for himself. But I don't think so. More than likely this individual inadvertently exposed the contents of a Pandora's Box which increasing numbers of fundamentalists are assembling in reserve for society at large and carefully keeping out of public view.

And to add insult to injury, very recently members of the largest protestant organization in the United States, the 15,000,000 member avowedly fundamentalist Southern Baptist denomination, voted at their national convention to institute an assertive program to convert Jews to Christianity.

If Freedom from Religion is not endemic to the Bill of Rights, and the Supreme Court should ever so decide, an aura of religious intolerance, denunciation, aggression and even suppression could begin to cover this nation like that fog, so vividly portrayed in the movie "The Ten Commandments," crept in over the land of Egypt when the Pharaoh refused to release the Hebrews.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #684 from JB of Fort Lauderdale, Florida (Part a)

(About a year ago JB read our pamphlet entitled JESUS CHRIST IS THE ANSWER?. Like several individuals before him, he decided to write an itemized critique which is preceded by the following introduction--Ed.)

Dear Mr. MacKenzie (sic)

Just a quick note to say hello and let you know that I enjoyed our brief chat last week on the phone. I really appreciate your taking the time to make sure that I received the material concerning your "ministry."

I must say that it has helped me to "dig deeper into many areas of scripture that I have taken for granted or never knew that anyone had a problem with. I will confess that there are some very difficult passages and apparent contradictions. On the other hand, I think many of them can be reasonably explained. Others will remain "in the dark" but I don't think that means there isn't an explanation. Then there are others that only God knows and has not revealed.... I have enclosed my responses to your material....

(Question #1 on the pamphlet is: While on the cross, Jesus said, "My God, My God, why has thou forsaken Me" (Mark 15:34). How could Jesus be our savior when he couldn't even save himself? Those aren't the words of a man voluntarily dying for our sins, those are the words of a man who can think of a hundred places he would rather be. JB's response is--Ed.),

Jesus never intended to save Himself. Could he not have summoned legions of angels to save Him? (Matt 26:53). Christ's mission was clear: "The Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give His life as a ransom for many." (Matt. 20:28). Atheists don't understand that, as a human being, Christ was subjected to all the pain and anguish that we mortals are subjected to. No doubt, there was much anguish in Christ's soul over what

He knew He had to do. Yet, He did it all...because He knew that was God's plan of salvation for the billions of people who would accept it.

Editor's Response to Letter #684 (Part a)

Rather than answering the question, JB, you gave me a Sunday School lesson. If Jesus never intended to save himself, then why is he yelling, "Let me out of here. Why have you forsaken me?" (paraphrasing). That sounds exactly like a man who is trying to save his own skin rather than donate it to others. You quote Matt. 20:28 to prove that he came to give his life for many, while completely discounting what he is saying in Mark 15:34. Let's be reasonable. Would he have used those words if that were his intent.

You say "Atheists don't understand that, as a human being, Christ was subjected to all the pain and anguish that we mortals are subjected to." But that's extraneous to the issue. We aren't concerned with the degree of pain involved; we are concerned with his intent, his willingness to undergo what is occurring. You have furtively changed the issue. He isn't complaining about the amount of anguish involved; he's protesting about being required to die at all. He's objecting to being on the cross to begin with

You say "He did it all...because He knew that was God's plan of salvation." I know the text says he did it; that's of no concern. Nor is why he did it of any import.. That's not the issue either. The question is: Did he do it voluntarily; that's the bone of contention. And you haven't yet provided a good explanation of why he would have said what he did if he were doing it voluntarily, indeed gladly.

Incidentally, please don't refer to what I am doing as a "ministry." You probably meant no harm, but that word carries definite religious baggage and implies we are somehow serving religion/superstition, an allegation I find utterly anathema.

Letter #684 Continues (Part b)

(Question #3 on the pamphlet is: Except for those of biased Christian writers, there isn't one writing outside the Bible in all of ancient history that refers to Jesus of Nazareth . JB's response is--Ed.),

The most widely read and appreciated book ever written is all you need. It is called the Word of God. What more do you want? The scarcity of books that refer to Christ is not a test of the reality of His existence. Biased Christian writers? You mean like those biased historical revisionists who want no vestige of Christ to remain?

Editor's Response to Letter #684 (Part b)

So "the most widely read and appreciated book ever written" is all I need?" I am not really sure I need to respond, since you appear to have opted for verbal hari-kari. I didn't know that degree of accuracy is directly proportional to degree of popularity. A lot of novels, magazines and other religious books must be fountains of truth in your eyes. If accuracy is proportional to popularity, then the Koran and other religious writings must have a significant degree of credibility from your perspective. All you are saying is that you don't really care how accurate a writing is as long as it's the most popular. You have allowed emotion, feeling, and desire to supplant logic, reason, and evidence.

When you say "It is called the Word of God. What more do you want?" the obvious reply is: I'd like some proof. Is that asking too much? That may be what it's called, but that doesn't make it so.

Your scenario seems to imply that if sacred books in other religions throughout the world relate ancient stories of their divine heroes and no other records exist of these heroes, they are authentic as long as they have a mass following.

You say, "The scarcity of books that refer to Christ is not a test of the reality of His existence." Nobody said it was. But it is certainly a giant stride in that direction. The conclusion may not be an air-tight cinch, but it's a close approximation.

And then you say, "Biased Christian writers? You mean like those biased historical revisionists who want no vestige of Christ to remain?" I am not sure whom you are referring to, although I assume it's members of the Jesus Seminar. I am in no position to speak for them but only for myself. However, I do think I can safely say that your assertion that they want "no vestige of Christ to remain" is a gross distortion. From what I have heard, the Seminar is essentially a body of liberal Christians, some of whom are ministers. But that's immaterial since we are off the topic anyway.

Letter #684 Continues (Part c)

(Question #4 on the pamphlet is: Isn't Jesus a false prophet since he wrongly predicted in Matt. 12:40 that he would be buried 3 days and 3 nights as Jonah was in the whale 3 days and 3 nights? Friday afternoon to Sunday morning is only one and a half days. JB's response is--Ed.),

No Jesus isn't a false prophet. Any part of a day in those times was considered as "a day" (Ester 4:16, 5:1). The day, or any part of it, was more like a time unit, or diurnal period. When you were born, you weren't born in a full day, but only a small portion of that day. Yet, that small portion is called your birthDAY. The portion of Friday to Saturday, was considered one day. Saturday was another day. And the portion of Sunday that He was raised was the third day. Friday, Saturday and Sunday all have a "night and day." Therefore, Jesus was in the grave "3 days and 3 nights."

Editor's Response to Letter #684 (Part c)

Unfortunately you did not heed the advice I offered a long time ago. I suggested that potential critics read our back issues before submitting a resolution to any problem, because more often than not they will be saved time, effort and embarrassment.. We addressed this response long ago and you appear to have been absent.

Jesus was a false prophet because 2 or 3 hours would hardly comprise a day as you are implying. If Jesus had said he would be in the grave for one day, would you contend that the prophecy had been fulfilled after he had been in the grave for only 2 or 3 hours or maybe 10 minutes? I think not. Yet, that is the essence of your argument. It said 3 days.

But even more important is the fact that the prophecy said three days and 3 NIGHTS. Three nights do not lie between Friday afternoon and Sunday morning.

You say, "Friday, Saturday and Sunday all have a "night and day." I see nothing in Scripture about him being in the grave Sunday night. If you insist on using the Jewish calendar in which a new day begins a 6 in the evening and assert Sunday evening comprises the period from 6 pm Saturday to Sunday morning, then that eliminates Friday night which begins as 6 pm on Thursday and ends Friday morning. The crucifixion and internment of Jesus did not occur until Friday after noon. Either way you are trapped. You should have read our back issues or at least my book

Letter #684 Continues (Part d)

(Question #6 on the pamphlet is: How could Jesus be our model of sinless perfection when He denies moral perfection in Matt. 19:17: "And Jesus said unto him, 'Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is God." JB's response is--Ed.),

He was not denying moral perfection, rather affirming His Deity. In Mark 10:17 the man refers to Jesus as "Good Master." Christ responds that there is only One who is good, and that is God alone. So Christ is either God, or not good. Indeed, He is both.

Editor's Response to Letter #684 (Part d)

How's that! Run that by me again! You say he is not denying moral perfection and yet he says, "Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is God." I have probably read that verse 30 times and I keep reaching the same conclusion. He is saying he is not good, at least he does not measure up to the perfection of God.

And you top this off with a real jaw dropper by saying, "So Christ is either God, or not good. Indeed, He is both." So he is God but he is not good. How could something be god and not good? How can god not be good and still be god? That goes a long way toward destroying the very definition of god. You might want to think this one through some more.

(Question #7 on the pamphlet is: In 1 Cor. 1:17 ["For Christ sent me [Paul] not to baptize but to preach the gospel"] Paul said Jesus was wrong when he said in Matt. 28:19, "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them...." So how could Jesus be the fountain of wisdom?. JB's response is--Ed.),

The command of Matt. 28:19 was given to the twelve but not limited to them. The NT clearly teaches that the Church is made up of individuals who perform different functions. Baptism is an ordination that can be performed by any Christian. Paul's ministry did not include baptisms, probably because he was too busy.

Editor's Response to Letter #684 (Part e)

You begin by saying, "The command of Matt. 28:19 was given to the twelve but not limited to them." Precisely! It extended to Paul as well. Thanks for the assistance. After this gratuitous admission, you then try to reverse direction by saying Paul was not meant to be included in the Matt. 28:19 instruction. He wasn't? Show me where that is stated in scripture. Jesus gave a command to ALL of his followers in Matt. 28:19, not just those he was addressing at that particular moment, which you readily concede. Just because "the Church is made up of individuals who perform different functions" does not mean anyone is exempt from this particular function. Where did Jesus specifically assign a particular or limited group of people to be the only baptizers? No, my friend, you have a clash between Jesus and Paul, and this is not the only time their views diverged

And what do you mean by saying he was too busy? Too busy to perform one of the most important rituals in Christianity? Indeed, for some Christians, baptism is mandatory for salvation. Yet, Paul is too busy?

Letter #684 Continues (Part f)

(Question #12 on the pamphlet is: In John 3:13 ["And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man...."]) Jesus erred because 2 Kings 2:11 ["...and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven"] shows Elijah went earlier. JB's response is--Ed.), Elijah did not 'originate' from heaven. Although he was taken up into heaven and appeared with Moses at the transfiguration of Christ, this verse deals specifically with Christ. Notice the order of Jesus' wording: Nobody has gone up into heaven who didn't come from there in the first place. Elijah went up to heaven, but he didn't come from there.

Editor's Response to Letter #684 (Part f)

Don't try to change the script. Nothing is said in regard to where Elijah originated. That isn't a consideration. Jesus is merely identifying whom he is referring to, when he says "but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man." Jesus is not saying "nobody has gone up into heaven who didn't come from there in the first place." Specifically the text says "but he" not "who didn't." Even clearer is the NIV which says, "No one has ever gone into heaven except the one who came from heaven".

But even more importantly, even if it did say "Nobody has gone up into heaven who didn't come from there in the first place" it would be patently false, because 2 Kings just told you that "Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven." and you admitted he did not come from there in the first place.

Succinctly stated, your problem is this. You said nobody has gone into heaven who didn't come from there in the first place. You admitted Elijah went to heaven. Therefore Elijah must have come from there in the first place according to you. But then you said, "he didn't come from there." You're contradicting yourself. You might want to think this one through again also.

Letter #684 Continues (Part g)

(Question #14 on the pamphlet is: Jesus told us to "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you" but ignored his own advice by repeatedly denouncing his opposition. Matt. 23:17 ("Ye fools and blind"), Matt. 12:34 ("O generation of vipers"), and Matt. 23:17 ("...hypocrites...ye are like unto whited sepulchers....") are excellent examples of hypocrisy. JB's response is--Ed.),

Christ loved everyone, but did not withhold verbal scoldings at the religious hypocrites of His day. The very people whom He came to redeem turned against Him with threats, accusations and "crucify Him, crucify Him.".... The verbal thrashings given by Jesus were deserved, but He still loved them.

Editor's Response to Letter #684 (Part g)

Does calling people the kind of names Jesus used sound like love to you? I assume you love your children, if you have any. Would you call them "fools, " "hypocrites," and "vipers"? Those aren't the words of a caring, loving and endearing parent.

Even more decisive is the fact that Jesus said you should bless your enemies. I can't help but notice how you dodged the word "bless" and focused on the word "love," because you think you can make an argument that he loved them all the time he was scolding them. But in no way could those words be deemed any sort of blessing. Jesus is cursing his opponents; he's not blessing them. He is ignoring his own advice.

Letter #684 Continues (Part h)

(Question #17 on the pamphlet is: Jesus told a man in Mark 8:34 that "whoever will come after me, let him deny himself, take up his cross and follow me." What cross? He hadn't died on the cross yet. There was nothing to take up. That man would have had no idea what he was talking about. JB's response is--Ed.),

At the time, it is probably true that nobody had any idea what Christ was talking about. Following His crucifixion, and especially pentecost, it came to have special meaning. To follow Christ will mean "suffering" to varying degrees, even death on a cross as Peter experienced. Today, many Christians have paid the price of discipleship with their lives. The cross is a symbol of suffering for what you firmly believe in. In this case, it is Christ.

Editor's Response to Letter #684 (Part h)

You begin by stating "At the time, it is probably true that nobody had any idea what Christ was talking about." That isn't a refutation, but a confirmation, of my point. Oh if only more apologetic replies were that painless, honest, and quick. Reminds me of a sign a supervisor I know has on her office door: "Save time; see it my way." Your reference to pentecost and the period following the Crucifixion are irrelevant to my question and need not be discussed.

But after your admission you revert to form with a digressive reference to alleged Christian martyrs. Can you prove Peter died on a cross? Do you have any biblical data to that effect? If so, by all means please come forward.

And from whence comes your extrabiblical assertion that "today, many Christians have paid the price of discipleship with their lives." Could you cite some examples of where innocent Christians have recently paid with their lives for being disciples?

Letter #684 Continues (Part i)

(Question #18 on the pamphlet is: In Mark 10:19 Jesus told a man to follow the commandments. Yet, one of those listed by Jesus was 'defraud not,' which is not even an OT commandment. JB's response is--Ed.),

"Defraud not ' is certainly not a commandment. But Christ was merely 'elaborating' by citing fraud as a sin whose roots can be associated with stealing, false testimony and covetting. Besides, why should Jesus not have the freedom to speak His mind when discussing such things as the commandments? If He wanted to use 'fraud' to help make His point, what is wrong with that?

Editor's Response to Letter #684 (Part i)

You begin by saying, "Defraud not is certainly not a commandment." and with that I am tempted to rest my case. But I'll string along. Then you say "Christ was merely 'elaborating' by citing fraud as a sin whose roots can be associated with stealing, false testimony and coveting." No he wasn't. Why? Because Mark 10:19 says, "Thou knowest the commandments, Do not commit adultery, Do not kill. Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Defraud not, Honor thy father and mother." This clearly shows "defraud not" being listed as a separate commandment. It is not being used to explain or elaborate on stealing, false testimony, or coveting any more than the latter are being used to clarify it.

I have no problem with Jesus speaking his mind or making his point. But when he says "Defraud Not" is a commandment, he is engaged in prevarication to put it mildly.

Letter #684 Continues (Part j)

(Question #20 on the pamphlet is: In Luke 23:43 Jesus said to the thief on the cross, "Today shalt thou be with Me in paradise." But how could they have been together in paradise that day if Jesus lay in the tomb for

3 days. JB's response is--Ed.),

This is probably one of the toughest things to explain. With Christ, you're dealing with the eternal God-man. As God, Jesus could never die. As man, he did. A difficult thing to understand. As God, the thief would join Him in "paradise." This may be very simplistic, but I will dig into this one much deeper.

Editor's Response to Letter #684 (Part j)

I wouldn't say you are going to dig into this as much as be buried by it. This is the old Trinitarian double talk which is not so much difficult to understand as it is impossible. It's an excellent example of what I have always referred to as the Great Back door, an escape hatch. When the gospels' contradictions finally become unbearable, apologists will grab for that final reconciliation of all contradictions by saying it can be both simultaneously. You can have an all-black white horse. You can have an imperfect perfect being. You can even have an omnipotent being who can create another being stronger than himself. Once you start down this cul de sac any concept can be deemed valid and at that point rational discussion becomes superfluous. Jesus has taken over.

Letter #684 Concludes (Part k)

(Question #22 on the pamphlet is: In Matt. 15:21 Jesus said, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel," but later told his followers to "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations" (Matt. 28:19). To whom, then, are we to go? Only to the Jews or everyone? JB's response is--Ed.),

Jesus was sent only to His people, the "lost sheep of Israel." The ultimate mission for souls was global as commanded by Christ. Today, the gospel is being preached in all nations. The gospel started in Judea, Samaria and then to the world.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #684 (Part k)

Jesus said he was sent only to his people. He was only supposed to go to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel." That was his mission as he saw it. Are you saying he was only applying that to himself? Only He was supposed to go to the Lost Sheep, while all of his followers were to go into all the world and preach to everyone? Is that your point? When he says "I am not sent" to whom does the "I" refer? Does it refer to his message? If so, then he is not telling the truth because he later said his message was to be taken unto all the world. Or does the "I" refer to him personally which would sound ridiculous because that would mean his message and all his followers are to go into all the world while he personally is going to the Israelites only.

You say, "The ultimate mission for souls was global as commanded by Christ." What ultimate mission? You mean the mission changed?

To return to the original question, you say "The gospel started in Judea, Samaria and then to the world." How could that be when Jesus said "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Why are missionaries from many churches, including your own, I would presume, traveling around the world in direct defiance of Christ's instructions?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #685 from FN of Huntsville, Texas

Dear Dennis. I am a freethinker incarcerated in the Texas penal system which doesn't pay its inmates. We are provided the basics only, except for orthodox religious literature. Then we are inundated daily with a soul-ful! All secular freethought or truth has to be purchased or donated from an outside source. I am unable to compensate you at this time.... Any issue outdated or otherwise in any condition of your "Biblical Errancy" publication will be read and shared with the few freethinkers here. Also any book like your "Encyclopedia"...would be appreciated. Please note that all packages must be clearly marked from "Biblical Errancy" and return address--no packages from individuals are allowed.

"Hands that help are far better than lips that pray"--Robert Ingersoll.

Editor's Response to Letter #685

Dear FN. Sounds like you are having religion rammed down your throat. As I noted in our last issue, if one of the heads of the Christian Coalition has his way, we could all be headed toward the condition in which you now reside. We sympathize with your plight and for that reason have decided to give you a six month subscription gratis.

Letter #686 from LH of Sherman Oaks, California

Dear Mr. McKinsey. I am the proud owner of a recently purchased copy of your Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy. The other evening I was able to spend a very enjoyable hour perusing the volume exploring the Bibliography, Index, and got to read the first 20 pages or so. I look forward to having the leisure time to be able to digest your wonderful book in its entirety!

I am a book collector as well as a reader and have a solid collection of Freethought books. I'm also a bit of a Thomas Paine student and my academic background is in history. I'm certainly weak on what's in the Bible, but I did read about half of the OT and chapters here and there in the four Gospels...35 years ago! I also note the seemingly fair review by Bill Lindley in the Truth Seeker. My very best wishes for lots of sales!

The Inerrancy section of chapter one states the crux (of the matter--Ed.). "How do you know what is true e when you begin to admit certain parts are false." Amazing that such a "leaky boat" is still afloat! On page 18 you quote Mr. Golding's synopsis of the process by which the Bible was formed. I'd like to submit to you that the reason the synopsis is "accurate and succinct" is because the passages quoted are taken almost verbatim from Part I of Paine's Age of Reason! Unless he credits Paine later, he is probably just unaware of his source....

Lastly, because of my historical background, I'd like to ask if fellow "freethinkers" have ever read Gibbon's marvelous two chapters on Christianity (#'s 15 and 16 of The Decline and Fall)? If you've somehow missed them you're in for a treat. Once you get used to the overlong sentence structure and the devastating ironic tone it's a joy to read....

My remarks are to you. I'm sure fundamentalists wouldn't be the least bit concerned with what Gibbon had to say!

P.S. Fortunately, before sending my letter I took the time to read a good part of your chapter 25 regarding tactics and the weakness of the "historical" approach in debating religionists and fundamentalists. I completely agree. Some of your remarks in Chapter 25 bring to mind one of my favorite quotes from J.M. Robertson in The Dynamics of Religion on page 61 where he says, "It is one of the stock theorems of modern Christian scholarship that no one is entitled to reject the NT without a good knowledge of Greek, though all are entitled to believe it without knowing one Greek letter from another and all are free to reject the Koran without having so much as seen a letter of Arabic.

Editor's Response to Letter #686

I appreciate your kind comments and especially like the poignant observation by Robertson. A real backslapper, isn't it! Too bad there are so many biblicists who can't sit back and see what is so easily comprehended by outside objectivists.

Letter #687 from DR of Rock Hill, South Carolina

Dear Dennis. In the Spring Issue of the Christian Research Journal I noticed your review of Gleason Archer's review of your book. In your letter you said the April 1996 issue of BE will be a refutation of his review. I would like to obtain a copy of the April issue if you have any left. I noticed CRI Journal did not have your mailing address so their readers could order a copy!

Editor's Response to Letter #687

Dear DR. I noticed that too. Got any theories on why? I do.

Letter #688 from JK of Lynn, Indiana

Sir... I like the #160 April issue very much. You sure knocked the props out from under this con artist, so called professor emeritus, Gleason Archer. You put him in the dung pile where his kind belongs. But like all scam artists of his stripe they have to protect their con game even to stooping to deception and subterfuge, which is their stock in trade. Keep up your good work. Maybe someday, I hope soon, the ignorant, superstitious people will open their eyes and see those religious hucksters for what they really are.

Letter #689 from GF of Mt. Prospect, Illinois

Dear Dennis. I am in the process of acquiring all BE back issues. Would that they were available half a lifetime ago when I spent 8 years in a Roman Catholic seminary.

EDITOR'S NOTE: For those people still having trouble getting through to us by E-mail our correct address is: KLO_McKinsey@K12.MEC.Ohio.gov

We are still seeking volunteers willing to play our video tapes on their local cable access channels. We now have 60 one half hour programs available.

COMMENTARY

We recently received a letter from a long time supporter in Louisiana who felt obliged to comment on what he felt was a change in approach on my part. Because of his comments I climbed upon a soap box and proceeded to write a response that was considerably longer than normal. This, in turn, prompted me to conclude that his observations would be addressed more appropriately in a commentary rather than a letter to the editor section. In any event, he stated,

"Allow me a thought on strategy. I believe I detect a new note of aggressiveness that I fear may prove counter productive. Religious superstitions are and will die of their own weight over a period of time. Whether this period of time is decades, centuries, or millennia I don't know but their demise is a certainty as long as scientific and rational thought progresses. Your own scholarly contribution is not yet fully appreciated but I have no doubt it will be. I just hope scientific and rational thought progresses fast enough for you to enjoy the accolades. Alas, I doubt it. But I have no doubt that the best strategy to convince others of the correctness of your position is to adopt a passive rather than an aggressive stance. Aggressiveness will not convince those who can not be convinced and will only further steel them and give them emotional ammunition in protecting the lord, the savior, et Al. So a strategy of foregoing aggressiveness loses nothing with them. However, aggressiveness may alienate some with the potential to be persuaded. They may well at first blush interpret aggressiveness as evilness and whatever open mindedness they might have may be turned off by the natural reflexive mechanism that religion has ingrained into them since childhood. On the other hand, if you are passive, merely defensively picking apart the statements of the bible and the arguments of religion generally, then "evilness" will less likely become a factor and, in fact, your reasonableness will be counter to what they have been led to expect from the godless."

In response to this letter I said, I appreciate the positive aspect of your observations but I'm somewhat puzzled as to why you would "detect a new note of aggressiveness on my part" Perhaps it's because of my comments in last month's issue regarding some extra biblical statements by a leader of the Christian Coalition in Florida. To be perfectly frank, I don't feel any more aggressive now than I did the day I started. Actually, I am not very comfortable with the word "aggressiveness.to begin with." The first definition of aggressive in Webster's New World Dictionary is that of being inclined to start fights or quarrels. His Thesaurus equates it with being warlike, bellicose, destructive, rapacious and barbaric. I would hardly consider those words to be an accurate representation of what I am doing. The word "aggressiveness" has an aura of hostility and animosity. We don't hate or demean our detractors, but we do sincerely feel sorry for them. They just don't realize how deeply and all pervasively they have been indoctrinated. It came to them as if through their mother's milk and they have never known anything different. A crude analogy would be one of having been born and raised in a cesspool. By the time you have reached adulthood you would not only fail to notice the smell but be quite convinced the aroma was normal. If those same people who defend the Bible with such vigor today had been born in Iran or Saudi Arabia, they would believe and adhere to the teachings of Mohammed with all the compassion and conviction they now apply to those of Jesus and the Bible. But they just can't see what is so obvious to any objective external observer.

We have always had an active and assertive program of taking facts to the opposition, but I don't consider that being aggressive. You say, "I have no doubt that the best strategy to convince others of the correctness of your position is to adopt a passive...stance." I just can't agree. Sitting back and resting on your laurels won't get the job done. You have to take the message to the other side. As I have said before, you can't expect them to come to you when they are already convinced they have the truth and believe your views are not only false but those of the devil. Passivity is the death knell for ideologies that seek to grow. Mormons and Jehovah's Witnesses, for example, spend millions of dollars on propagandizing each year. Do you seriously think they would continue these programs if they weren't gaining adherents and effectively spreading the word? Do you know of any companies or corporations that don't spend valuable funds to advertise their message? They spend billions each year fully aware of the fact that passivity to them would be comparable to a death sentence. Political parties spend untold sums to get their ideas out to as many people as possible and also spend millions to frustrate and thwart dispersal of their opponent's message. From telemarketers to the visual media, nearly everybody is selling something and passivity is the last thing on their minds. Passivity is precisely what a good salesman does not exhibit.

Apparently you are operating on the theory that as long as your views are correct you don't have to worry. Eventually the world will beat a path to your door. I am sorry to say but that is completely wrong! If people with money are opposed to what you are disseminating; if people of power and influence don't want your message to get around, your entire program can be kept in a detached state of limbo almost indefinitely. Being right does not guarantee automatic victory. Not by any means. Just because you are correct does not mean your program is going to prevail. The word "religion" is nothing but a euphemistic veneer for superstition, mythology, and folklore, but that has not prevented it from having been around for a long time, nor has it forestalled its continued growth. Money, power, and influence have far more to do with what prevails than accuracy, truthfulness, and realism.

Problems in this regard have even fallen on my own doorstep. I have personally encountered problems in this regard. I have been in radio debates with fundamentalists in which, to put it mildly, I have embarrassed the competition. In several instances, it was more than a defeat and clearly showed that my ideas deserved as much of a hearing on the airways as my competitor, if people are to hear the truth. But do you think I was called back? No way! They weren't about to provide me with any more access to the public than I had already received. Talk show hosts have told me on the air that they definitely wanted to have me back but I never heard from them again. Why? Either callers, sponsors, station management, owners, or influential people managed to work their will, which shows beyond doubt that accuracy, truthfulness, and precision alone are not sufficient by any means to carry the day. It takes more than that, believe me. As I said, I know from personal experience, first hand, no less. If you doubt what I am saying, just go out and present a powerful, accurate, and convincing case against the Bible and Jesus and see how far you get on the airways.

Not only do you have opposition from powerful and influential people as well mass objection, but you have the additional problem of dealing with the profit margin dilemma. Talk shows are especially egregious in this regard. They aren't nearly as interested in accuracy as they are in ratings and the bottom line. Even though what I have to present is true and my arguments are potent and convincing, stations don't care, if it's turning off listeners and viewers. I am not making them sufficient money and that's their primary concern. The same problem is encountered with getting a book published. Consequently, the word that gets out, the voice that gets heard, is the one that tells people what they want to hear rather than what they ought to hear. As is true of so much in this society that which circulates best is that which appeals to the lowest common denominator. Talk about a program made to order for the dumbing down of America.

Not only does the bottom line strongly influence what gets heard but you are not going to get your message distributed throughout the land, no matter how accurate it may be, if those in charge of the organs of dissemination or those who can afford dissemination costs are not providing assistance. In fact, they could very well be not only be a positive hindrance but very supportive of the Bible and religion in general, in which case truth will remain buried for a long time, unless somebody struggles to bring it to the surface.. TV preachers, for example, spread an incredible number of lies, distortions, misinterpretations, and out of context remarks and do so totally unopposed, simply because they have the wherewithal. Do you see them fading into the sunset? Where do you see truth overtaking them? No my friend, passivity does not cut it. Assertiveness supported by the means to get the job done is where it's at.

You say, "Religious superstitions are and will die of their own weight over a period of time." Too many freethinkers have been kidding themselves with that remark for too many centuries. All these years of growth have made the trunk of their religious tree extremely heavy, that's true, but unfortunately it has become very thick and solid with money, power and influence. Regarding religious superstitions, you say that "their demise is a certainty as long as scientific and rational thought progresses." A certainty yes, but in what century? Unfortunately, if you don't push them, they are not going to fall over, especially when they have hundreds of millions of dollars, the media, and vast resources propping them up. You are talking like an optimistic determinist who believes that goodness will triumph in the end. This kind of thinking is indicative of one who has been religiously influenced to believe that a kind, beneficent being presiding over the universe will not let evil prevail. But unfortunately it will reign supreme as long as good men and women remain passive. What is that old canard: All that is necessary for evil to prevail is for good men to do nothing.

Recently I received an advertising pamphlet from the largest circulating secular humanist magazine in the world, Free Inquiry. Although I am not an authority on their editorial policies I detect from the pamphlets contents a significantly heightened concern about the inroads being made by biblicists . It is entitled Fighting Back! A Manual for Free-Thinkers and among other things it says, "There's a time for reading philosophy. There's a time for reformulating your own ideas. And there's a time to stand up for your ideals. NOW is the time to stand up and fight back. If not now, when. You are currently facing a serious and immediate threat to your liberties and constitutional rights. Armies of zealots are invading the very fabric of your freedom to live and think as you like. They block abortion clinic entrances. They threaten to control public schools. They censor textbooks and curricula. They use the mainstream media with impunity to infuse fear of free thought. And they indoctrinate the susceptible with notions that are clearly counter to our constitution. (Even more, they are counter to the truth--Ed.). This is no horror story taken from a novel. It's happening now...and it is growing in strength. It's not a lively, heated debate..it's action, deeds--and has even gone so far as murder.... Your freedom and liberties are getting less secure with each passing day. A look at newspapers and TV news makes the vulnerability of your freedom crystal clear...." All of these inroads and assaults are to be expected when Christian organizations are led by people who say that the United States Constitution does not guarantee freedom from religion.

My main criticism of this document is that it does not mention the importance of combating the Bible and biblical indoctrination wherever possible. Rather than fighting biblicists at a rather superficial level, wouldn't it be more realistic to demolish the base from which all their leaps spring. Unless the fundamental beliefs of these zealots are altered, weakened, or destroyed, freethinkers are going to find themselves on a never-ending treadmill of running from pillar to post putting out one brushfire after another. Even more importantly fires are going to arise faster than they can be extinguished because there are more of them than us.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #690 from NB of Tucson, Arizona (Part a)

You seem obsessed with me, for some reason, devoting far more space than I personally think I am worth

Editor's Response to Letter #690 (Part a)

Why would you think I am obsessed with you, since you have received considerably less print than many other people. I am inclined to believe you've allowed a subconscious yearning to supplant reality. As far as you receiving more attention than you are worth is concerned, those are your words, not mine.

Letter #690 Continues (Part b)

But I feel I must reply to your comments on my letter #679. First, I know you never claimed specifically to know a lot of Hebrew and Greek, but you are constantly criticizing your readers for their ignorance of the original texts, so what else could I assume.

Editor's Response to Letter #690 (Part b)

You could assume you misinterpreted the point I made. I never said people could not read the original texts, be they in Greek or Hebrew. I said they couldn't be found for certain in order to be read. That's a significant difference. Since everyone agrees the originals no longer exist, there is no way people can know for certain what the original text said, assuming there was an original text.

Letter #690 Continues (Part c)

When I said you "still" had not corrected the incorrect citations, I was noting that the original incorrect citations were in BE#158. By the time of BE#161 you still hadn't commented on them. (Remember--Ed.) you have an incorrect citation for Kings and another for Chronicles, and by my count that makes two. Whether I have commented in a "derogatory" manner is open to interpretation, but then I never accused you (as you did me) of "transparent sophistries".

Editor's Response to Letter #690 Continues (Part c)

As I told you when you made this same point earlier, I was not aware of two incorrect citations on my part. I am now aware of them and they have been corrected. But you keep acting as if I am either too lazy, too stubborn, or too uncritical to make the corrections. If there is anyone with an obsession it is someone who keeps returning to the same arguments in a futile attempt to patch up holes they made earlier. You are commenting in a furtively "derogatory" manner and you know it. And as far as "transparent sophistries" is concerned I would only ask readers to read the contents of this letter as well as your prior one and judge for themselves.

Letter #690 Continues (Part d)

I'm well aware that the Septuagint is just another translation, but it does have some authority. At the very least you could have commented on why you think the Septuagint's translators chose to omit the bit about 2000 "baths", If they weren't using the Masoretic Texts, what texts were they using?

Editor's Response to Letter #690 Continues (Part d)

To begin with, I think you could do with a refresher course in the history of textual formation. How could the Septuagint's translators have used the Masoretic text when the Septuagint was written around 250 BC and the Masora did not come onto the scene until approximately 400 years later.

Second, if I am obligated to comment on why I think the Septuagint's translators chose to omit the bit about 2000 "baths," then you are obligated to explain why so many translations inserted it. And you can start with the Jewish Masoretic Text.

And lastly, as far as I am aware the Septuagint translators were using Hebrew manuscripts to make a Greek translation of the OT. But how does this have any more bearing on the issue than any other translation?

Letter #690 Continues (Part e)

As to 1 Cor. 10:8 ("Neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed, and fell in one day 23,000"--Num. 25:9 says it was 24,000"). The copyist defense may be old, but some things improve with age. You don't actually disprove that defense, you merely attack those who try to use it. This is the "argumentum ad hominem" and it is far earlier than any issue of BE.

Editor's Response to Letter #690 (Part e)

I'm sorry to differ! I discredited that ploy long ago in no uncertain terms. You, not I, are obligated to prove somebody copied something wrong. The versions that are available and the manuscripts from which they came have the contradictions staring us in the face. And until you produce some tangible, bona fide, hardcore evidence that something was copied incorrectly, the contradictions stand. How do you know the contradictory manuscripts are not an accurate reflections of what the original says? Speculation is not going to save your idol. If speculation is sufficient, then I am of the opinion that I am a reincarnation of Napoleon. Now prove my belief is invalid. The copyist defense does not improve with age; it just ages those who try to prove it.

Letter #690 Continues (Part f)

I plead guilty to a typographical error in citing "Nehemiah 6" instead of "Nehemiah 7. I was using the NIV (silly me) and I only noticed the heading "Nehemiah 6:16" at the top of the page and I didn't notice that Chapter 7 started in the middle of the left-hand column. But I am not publishing a newsletter which purports to debunk the Bible, as you are. I shall, in the future, "heed my own advice", but it is you, not I, who can ill afford to make mistakes in your citations. I am more than willing to admit that I made a mistake, though the correction was obvious and in any case it didn't destroy my argument, a statement that you may not always be able to make.

Editor's Response to Letter #690 (Part f)

You are trying to sound profound and only floundering in the process. But, of course, you did admit you were being silly at one point didn't you. You say that your incorrect citation did not not destroy your argument, but when I make that kind of mistake it does destroy mine. I fail to see the distinction. Perhaps that's because there is none. No one can afford to make mistakes in their citations, neither you nor I. That is not a prerogative bestowed upon those engaged in dialogue. You allege that "it is you, not I, who can ill afford to make mistakes." I couldn't disagree more. Letters to the Editor are no more exempt from this obligation than the writings of the editor himself. We all have a responsibility to be as precise as possible and anyone who sends us a letter with incorrect citations and erroneous comments should feel thoroughly ashamed for having possibly deceived an audience willing to give that writer a hearing. I am not only quite willing to admit any incorrect citations I have made but more than eager to make the needed corrections. My assistant and I proofread, but we can't get them all. Not when you are dealing with a periodical as packed with facts and figures as this one is and when all assistance is voluntary. If I had the staff and money of CRI, you can safely assume incorrect citations would be history.

Moreover, we don't just purport "to debunk the Bible." We do debunk it.

And finally, you say in reference to yourself, "I made a mistake, though the correction was obvious and in any case it didn't destroy my argument, a statement that you may not always be able to make." Run that by me again! I "may not always be able to make" but you will? You are somehow exempt but I am not! Talk about a double standard! If a statement is applicable to me, then it is equally applicable to you. Your "logic" leaves me bewildered

Letter #690 Continues (Part g)

I have no desire to try to prove how the accounts in Ezra and Nehemiah were "originally written". It is you, not I, who claim infallibility. I only suggest possibilities. It is you who must, in your "ipse dixit"

(arbitrary or dogmatic statements--Ed.), have "truth on your side", while I don't really care all that much about it. When I suggest that the possibility may exist, I don't say that I can prove that such a possibility actually happened. Contrary to your oft-stated assertion, the burden is on you to prove that you are right. Merely deriding your critics won't do the job. The critics may be wrong, but it will take more than your say-so to prove it.

Editor's Response to Letter #690 (Part g)

Keep trying. Maybe eventually you will get it right.

First, when did I ever "claim infallibility"? Give me the exact time and place. I don't want any glittering generalizations. I want a specific citation and you have nearly 14 years of back issues to select from.

Second, you say that you don't really care that much about having truth on your side. Well finally it comes to light! That's the most accurate and candid remark you have made. I can certainly believe that judging from your statements so far. Apparently you finally got something right after all. Now, why can't you be that truthful and open in all of your remarks? You can begin by admitting that you are desperate to unearth or concoct any defense of the Bible that can somehow be made plausible.

Third, you say you have "no desire to try to prove how the accounts in Ezra and Nehemiah were 'originally written'." In other words, you are not going to be so foolish as to try to reconcile them. And I can understand that. I wouldn't want that assignment either. I am in no mood to generate a migraine or foment insomnia.

Fourth, I don't really think you are in any position to accuse others of tossing around "ipse dixit", in view of the fact that they seem to be endemic to your stock and trade.

Fifth, you are still lingering under the delusion, along with many of your cohorts I might add, that the mere concoction of possibilities is sufficient to reconcile contradictions. According to you the mere act of suggesting something could have occurred is enough to prove whatever is suggested is valid and is to be accepted as possible until skeptics or doubters prove it did not happen. For some reason or other the inherent fallacy in this line of reasoning is not getting through to you. Why do I have to keep going back over plowed ground again and again. Don't you understand that this is nothing more than a variation of the "Prove God does not exist" ploy? Why is that so difficult to understand? Worm and squirm as you may, you are never going to escape from the dirt. You are not going to elude my fundamental premise that the burden of proof lies on he who alleges. As I have said so often, it is the death knell of all religious/superstitious thought. If the mere possibility of something happening is all that is necessary, then I could have a field day with the Bible and its supporters. Happy times would, indeed, have arrived. My obligations and research burdens would be drastically reduced, my imagination would be unfettered and scenarios could flow like waters from a mighty stream. I could say Paul was a pedophile since he constantly told people to greet others with a holy kiss. And since Jesus was never married, he regularly visited brothels. Peter was the devil in disguise in light of what Jesus called him and the OT's authors were actually agents of the devil who intentionally wanted to make god look bad by depicting him as they do in the OT. Jesus's mother was a prostitute and Joseph was nothing more than a nice guy trying to cover up for her immorality. Although Adam and Eve were kicked out of the Garden of Eden for eating the forbidden fruit, that was nothing more than a symbolic reference to having had intercourse without permission. And Moses was allowed to lead the Israelites out of Egypt only because he agreed to sleep with the pharaoh's wife who then persuaded her husband to let them go. To say that my inventiveness could go absolutely wild in this regard is an understatement. The possibilities are almost infinite. Every one of these accounts could have happened. Prove they didn't. In fact, according to you they are to be given credibility until biblicists can prove they didn't occur, which is virtually impossible. Under your "logic," and as a biblicist, you have no right whatever to criticize those who suggest these scenarios because you cannot prove they did not occur.

Additional evidence that you did not internalize what went before is shown in the fact that I told you earlier that even if there had been a copyist error, you have no way of knowing which fact or figure is inaccurate. Consequently you are left with no alternative except to expunge both from the Bible. For example, you noted the fact that 1 Kings 7:26 and 2 Chron.4:5 are identical except the first says 2000 baths while the second says 3000. You say, in effect, "No problem, somebody just copied something wrong." Sorry, my friend but it's a monumental problem of staggering proportions. You have no way of knowing which was copied wrong, even if we assumed a copyist mistake was the source of the dilemma. And because you have no way of knowing, you are left with no alternative but to extract both from Scripture. One of them is definitely a lie, to put it bluntly, and since there is no way of determining which is the culprit, the only way to retain the Bible's alleged perfection is to delete both. Of course, once you start down this path you are going to all but massacre the Book. By the time you are done, there won't be enough Scripture left of real substance to fill a thimble. With defenders like you the Bible wouldn't need critics like me.

Letter #690 Continues (Part h)

Of course, I never accused you of saying specifically that "everything in the Bible is false because there is a discrepancy between 2000 and 3000 'baths'". I was being facetious and you should have recognized it as such.

Editor's Response to Letter #690 (Part h)

What do you mean you never accused me of saying "everything in the Bible is false because there is a discrepancy between 2000 and 3000 'baths'". For goodness sake man, don't you have any integrity. Is your blind allegiance to the Bible and Jesus so all consuming that nothing else really matters and the ends justifies the means. You said, and I am quoting verbatim, "Anyway to assert that everything in the Bible is false because there is a discrepancy between 2000 and 3000 'baths' is like saying that the Titanic had a problem with a few of its rivets." And I responded by saying, I would challenge you to show me anywhere in the entire history of this periodical that I ever asserted "that everything in the Bible is false because there is a discrepancy between 2000 and 3000 'baths'"? With all due respect, NB, that comment reeks with ignorance. Who on earth with a scintilla of sanity would say that an entire book is false because one contradiction is contained therein?

And please don't try to hawk any of this "I was being facetious" nonsense. Who are you trying to kid? You made a stupid statement and now you are trying to back peddle out of it by saying it was all just a joke. You even went out of your way to make an analogy with the Titanic. Remember what I said long time ago. Pick your words very carefully, like apples from a tree, because what you pick you may have to eat. I have eaten a few in my day and even gagged on a couple; but you learn from experience. I'm not perfect but I'm light years ahead of my competition.

Letter #690 Continues (Part i)

Nevertheless, as a matter of logic, a single counter example is sufficient to disprove an entire argument. If the Bible is supposed to be "inerrant", as the majority of fundamentalists/evangelicals routinely claim, then one single contradiction disproves the whole proposition. You don't need "avalanches", "mountains" and "tidal waves". to prove the errancy of a document for which the claim is made that it is "inerrant". One will do quite nicely, thank you.

Editor's Response to Letter #690 (Part i)

For once we agree. I have no problem with these comments whatever. In fact, that is precisely the point biblical exposers have been making for centuries. Now if you can just get your compatriots to see the accuracy of your observation, my task will have been accomplished. Unfortunately, tidal waves and avalanches are necessary for those who insist on fighting on every point and keeping their finger in the dike like the Dutchman. For millions of biblicists, to concede anything is to concede everything and only by drowning them in a baptism of contradictory revelations can they be "born again." (To be Concluded Next Month)

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #691 from TS of Prescott Valley, Arizona

I've just received my introductory copy of BE. It's great!.... Your weekly T.V. shows are like a breath of fresh air here in an area that is saturated with superstition. Too bad you're not shown on a daily basis.

Editor's Response to Letter #691

Thanks for the compliments and I'd like to see our programs shown daily as much as you. You might want to see if more showings during the week can be arranged. Stations respond to interest. We would sure appreciate the assistance.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #690 from NB Continues From Last Month (Part j)

Let me change the subject a bit, and congratulate you for you Editor's Note on the Florida situation on prayer in the schools. Were you also aware that in Alabama, textbooks must now carry a disclaimer that evolution is "a controversial theory"? Or that New Hampshire is considering requiring "parental permission" before teaching evolution? Or that last spring the Tennessee legislature narrowly defeated a law making it illegal to teach evolution as fact? And that the Tennessee Senate approved, by a vote of 37 to 1, a non-binding resolution urging businesses and families to post copies of the Ten Commandments on their walls and to "live by them?" (The only dissenting vote was cast by the Tennessee Senate's only Jew.).... Looks like you've got your work cut out for you.

Editor's Response to Letter #690 (Part j)

No. I would say it looks like anyone who cares about the Constitution, and especially the first amendment to the Bill of Rights, has his work cut out for him. I wasn't so much concerned about prayer in the public schools of Florida as the far broader question of freedom from religion in general. In Saudi Arabia and Iran freedom from religion does not exist. Women must dress in religious garb, prayer is mandatory, as is religious education in the schools. Your taxes are used to support religion, all criticism of religious teachings is suppressed and failure to attend the mosque of your choice is punished one way or the other.. Algeria, Egypt, and Turkey could very well adopt this repressive philosophy and, make no mistake about it, many Christians are surreptitiously working to adopt similar medieval nonsense here. We both know they put "under God" in the pledge of allegiance and "In God we Trust" on our coins. How could one have more blatant violations of the First Amendment?

Your congratulation is most appreciated but you seem to make light of the overall situation. I have no idea what your religious orientation is but you should realize that liberal Christianity and Judaism are viewed by fundamentalists as being in league with atheists, agnostics, and humanists and will no doubt be opposed in the same manner when conditions warrant.. Who knows, they might even be physically treated in the same manner if given the opportunity.

Letter #690 Concludes with an Addendum (Part k)

Having said all that, I am herewith renewing my subscription to BE for another year. Contrary to the popular myth, Voltaire never said "I disagree with every word you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it", but it is a philosophy to which I heartily subscribe.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #690 (Part k)

A fair and impartial hearing is all we ask. If only all biblicists were of like mind..

Letter #692 from RN of Moscow, Idaho (Part a)

Dear Dennis.... Your treatment by the Christian Research Journal is outrageous but typical of fundie outfits. They exist not to do research but to reinforce the wishful thinking of themselves and their ad-herents. A similar "research" organization is the Institute for Creation Research. Neither the CRI nor the ICR has any standing in the world of scholarship. As the Rev. Nick Cardell, the Unitarian-Universalist minister at Syracuse, N.Y. told me, "There are Bible scholars, and there are fundamentalists."

I had a similar experience recently with the editor of the Spokane, Washington Spokesman-Review . He just threw my carefully researched reply in the waste paper basket.

No doubt Gleason Archer--pardon me, I should have said Dr. Gleason Archer;; the fundies sure like their academic degrees--has already read your exposures of his joke book Encyclopedia of Bible Difficulties. Although it was copyrighted in 1982 neither a supplemental volume nor a revised edition has yet appeared. This is strange because in his preface (page 12) he invites readers to send further contradictions and errors--pardon me, difficulties --to his publisher. In the meantime, since 1983, you have published Biblical Errancy every month and your huge book entitled The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy in 1995. DOCTOR Archer obviously has read them but we won't hear anything more from him.

Editor's Response to Letter #692 (Part a)

From what I have been able to judge I think your last sentence is on the mark. Very few fundamentalists are willing to participate in an on-going discussion. Hit and Run is much more their style.

Letter #692 Continues (Part b)

The argument over the word again in John 20:9 ("For as yet they knew not the scripture, that he must rise again from the dead") in some translations seems to me to be a matter of usage rather than literal meaning. In The New Greek-English Interlinear New Testament (Wheaton, Ill.: Tyndale House, c1990)--the only worthwhile book ever issued by that publisher--we read ek nekron anastenai = from the dead to rise up.

The Greek prefix an is similar to the Latin prefix re, which Jerome uses in his Vulgate: a mortuis resurgere. We have many English words derived from Latin which begin with the prefix re, like resurgent, resurrect, replace, restore, etc. The prefix re doesn't necessarily mean that the action had taken place before, any more than the word again. For example we can say, "The Book fell off the shelf, but I put it back again" or "Jesus died, but he rose again...."

Editor's Response to Letter #692 (Part b)

Although I am in general agreement with the first part of your letter, this second half is another matter. I think you got lost in the shuffle somewhere, RN, and only succeeded in disproving your own argument. You began by saying "The argument over the word again in John 20:9 in some translations seems to me to be a matter of usage rather than literal meaning." Apparently you are saying the word "again" does not mean the event is being repeated. But then you say, "The Greek prefix an is similar to the Latin prefix re, which Jerome uses in his Vulgate: a mortuis resurgere." The prefix "re" means again and all you are doing is providing evidence that those who used the English word "again" when they translated from the Greek were correct. You further verify the accuracy of their translation by saying, "We have many English words derived from Latin which begin with the prefix re, like resurgent, resurrect, replace, restore, etc." All of these words mean the event is happening more than once which provides additional support for use of the word "again" in the original translation. But then you say, "The prefix re doesn't necessarily mean that the action had taken place before, any more than the word again." It doesn't? I think it does. Your own examples which you subsequently submitted prove it does. You say, "For example we can say, 'The Book fell off the shelf, but I put it back again' or 'Jesus died, but he rose again.'" These examples are clearly saying the act is being repeated. If no repetition were involved, then the word "again" could be omitted in each.

The problem with your analysis is that you make comments and then turn around and provide evidence to disprove your own assertions. Moreover, your disproof is far more accurate than your original allegation. I know you have been a long-time supporter of BE and I hope you take these observations in the comradely manner intended.

Letter #692 Concludes (Part c)

A couple of nits. Ad nauseam is correct. Remember, fundamentalists give us nausea.

Instead of the roundabout construction--which you always get correct, I might add--"As far as...is concerned." it is easier and just as correct to say, "As for.... Then you don't have to be concerned at the end. Keep up the good work.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #692 (Part c)

Your observations are well taken. I just hope I can remember them. Writing is something you can never get perfected. It is an on-going process of constant improvement.

Letter #693 from DA of La Puente, California (Part a)

(DA never lays any groundwork for what he is about to discuss but always leaps right in as if we had just spent several hours discussing it. In referring to the contradiction we mentioned between Matt. 21:31 ("The publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you") with 1 Cor. 6:9-10 ("Neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners shall inherit the kingdom of God") he begins by saying,

You sent another issue (May, 1996--ED.) so I send you a few corrections. Matt. 21:31 Harots (sic) are more likely to make it into heaven than chief priests. vs. 1 Cor. 6:9-10 sinners will not get into Heaven. Okay, we try again to explain (sic.). a) As a technical point, 1 Cor. 6:9-10 doesn't mention prostitutes, the subject of Matt. 21:31. (Adultry [sic] is the sin of the married, the male in particular, and the prostitute may or may not be married.) Of course, the author would, correctly, insist the proper reading would include prostitutes, and a number of other unmentioned classes of sinners, but you do like to be technical on words, and on such a basis, there is no logical conflict at all.

Editor's Response to Letter #693 (Part a)

Your main point is that 1 Cor. 6:9-10 doesn't mention prostitutes. It doesn't? You'd better check again. What do you think fornicator means. Webster's New World Dictionary says fornication is "any unlawful sexual intercourse, including adultery." You made the mistake of focusing on the word "adultery" when "fornication" is much broader and encompasses the former. Either you erred or you were trying to deceive, because the word adultery is subsumed within the word fornication and for that reason the contradiction stands.

Letter #693 Continues (Part b)

A comparative does not mean either will in fact do anything. It merely ranks. If a plane has 50 seats and 60 people already in them, an announcement that women and children will be ranked ahead of men among any additional customers is perfectly correct, if hardly important since neither will board.

Editor's Response to Letter #693 (Part b)

To begin with, how do you get 60 people into 50 seats. I think that highlights your facility with biblical defense in general In any event, who said a comparative did anything other than rank? I didn't. But later, when these people die, the inaccuracy of the prediction will be borne out, unless, of course, no prostitutes or chief priests will ever enter heaven. Is that what you are contending? If you are, then you are portraying Jesus as something of an incompetent. Why would he say, "The publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you" when neither is going into heaven?

Letter #693 Continues (Part c)

When we add (the following verses in--Ed.) context, Matt. 21:32 and 1 Cor. 6:11, we find both are saying the repenting sinner...is not barred from Heaven. The reformed prostitute is getting into Heaven before the unreformed chief priest...

Editor's Response to Letter #693 (Part c)

If the person is reformed, then that person is no longer a prostitute. If that person is no longer a prostitute, then that person is no longer entering heaven as a prostitute. And if that person is no longer entering heaven as a prostitute, then you have completely ignored the original contradiction by simply rewriting the script. Remember the original problem? Matt. 21:31 said harlots will go into the kingdom of heaven while 1 Cor. 6:9-10 says they won't. You tried to resolve the problem by saying a prostitute reformed and then entered heaven; so there is no problem. Yes there is. Because that person reformed, she did not enter heaven as a prostitute. What are you trying to say--Once a criminal always a criminal?

Letter #693 Continues (Part d)

"THE BURDEN OF PROOF IS ON HE WHO ALLEGES." a) You have heard the sermon note "Argument weak here, yell like hell."? b) tho actually you are quite correct. the allegor must prove the alleged. & you the one alleging the contradiction. You are the one saying there is a green man, to use your earlier example. If I make a statement like the Bible is true, I am the one doing the alleging and under the burden of proof. But contradictions within the Bible, exist or don't exist, without regard to the truth of the Bible. So when you say that X contradicts Y, you are the one who must prove it. Your claim that "...two statements...are contradictory on their face." is not sufficient proof.

Editor's Response to Letter #693 (Part d)

I didn't know I was yelling and I fail to see how my position is weak. Because I ask someone to prove their point, my position is weak? You never cease to amaze me DA. Have you ever thought of enrolling in Rational Thought 101. Then, after your snide remark you turn 180 degrees and say I am "quite correct." How could my argument be weak, when you just admitted I was quite correct?

Then you say that my claim that two statements are contradictory on their face. "is not sufficient proof." I beg to differ. When one statement says Jesus is god and another says he is not; when one statement says all men are sinners while another says Job was perfect; when one statement says Jesus was the first person to go to heaven and another says Elijah went there earlier; when one statement says go to all the world and another says go to the Jews only; when one statement says you are saved by works and another says it is by faith alone; when (well you get the idea). When you have contradictions on their face, such as these, I don't have to prove there is a contradiction. That's obvious. You have to prove there isn't.

You allege that when I say that X contradicts Y, I must prove it. No I don't. It's obvious to anyone who is not an intransigent ideologue and can read simple English. Taking your "reasoning" to its logical conclusion, if I said I had an all black white horse and you said that was a logically impossible contradiction, I could turn to you and say, prove it. You are living proof of why children should not be allowed to get near religion. Anything that can warp your thought processes that much is just plain dangerous. Sanity is no longer a factor. The Bible and Jesus have taken over. When you allege that my claim "...two statements...are contradictory on their face." is not sufficient proof, you leave the world of reasoning, rational thought, and logic and enter a phantasmagoric realm of deception, denial, and duplicity in which you really can have an all-black white horse, $2 + 2$ can equal 5, a perfect God can be imperfect, a dead man can be living, millions can be saved without accepting a mandatory universal savior etc. Even the most intractable fundamentalists rarely deny there is a contradiction, or what they would call a seeming contradiction, on the face of what I present. Instead, they try to reconcile, rationalize, explain or harmonize the conflict. But they are not so unbalanced as to deny what is staring them in the face.

You, on the other hand, appear to be determined to deny even the most elemental laws of logic in your on-going crusade to salvage the Bible. The kind of strategy you are trying to foist on others is very similar to that which is found among inmates of mental institutions. When you tell me you can have an all black white horse or X can be X and not X simultaneously, and when you also tell me that I must prove that you can't, then further discussion becomes useless, because I have no intention of wasting my time talking to the human equivalent of a door. The latter moves, acts as a hindrance, and doggedly shuts things in and out but that's about all.

(In the May issue I stated, "The KJV and the ASV were written when religion ruled the roost and translators didn't have to worry about critics such as myself--Ed.). DA says in response,

a) the writers of the KJV had to worry about critics, like the King, who could throw them in jail among other things. That's a little more serious than a bad book review which is all you can manage.

Editor's Response to Letter #693 (Part e)

What a desperate comparison. The King and his aides hand-picked the men who were on the translation committee. The general views of those chosen to compile the KJV were already known before the committee was even assembled. And yet we are supposed to believe the King is going to imprison men he, himself, chose?

Even more importantly, the King had the final say on what the book contained. After all, it had his name on it, so it had better say what he wanted. Anyone who was not translating to his specifications could have been easily dismissed or outvoted.

Thirdly, and most important of all, you again performed your quick-foot shuffle by shifting the focus from what I said to what you wanted to twist into the issue. If you had read with more concern for care and less for carp, you would have noticed that I said, "translators didn't have to worry about critics such as myself." Was King James a critic such as myself? Was there the remotest possibility he would ever become a critic "such as myself?" Of course not. He was extremely religious and had no intention of criticizing the Bible in manner I propound.

And your final comment is indicative of one who is more concerned with offense than clarity. Are you saying my review is bad or the book being reviewed is bad? I would agree wholeheartedly with the latter but not the former. If the former would you be so kind as to provide some citations that would make this observation valid. In true biblicist style, you just saw what you incorrectly perceived to be a good opportunity to make a snide comment with little regard for lucidity.

Letter #693 Continues (Part f)

b) The KJV was written under a set of rules, the 1st of which was political. (That the officially approved Bishops Bible was to be the approved text on points of dispute.) The idea that the KJV was free from political taint has to be rejected. If anything, it probably suffered more from politics than more recent works.

Editor's Response to Letter #693 (Part f)

I have no doubt the KJV was wrapped in religious politics and various individuals and groups were pushing for their version of every verse. But all of them had a pro-Bible perspective. None of them were openly critical of the Bible per se. So we are not talking about inter-religious politics; we are talking about the politics associated with the KJV's composition vis a vis potential critics and detractors such as myself. And because the influence of critics such as myself in 1611 was significantly less than exists today, the Book's translators did not have to worry about "writing out" or excising contradictions by adding to, subtracting from, or altering the text. Because these translators were not "under the microscope" from people such as myself nearly as much as would be true today, expediency could be of less concern than fidelity to manuscripts.

In your last sentence, you say "if anything, it probably suffered more from politics than more recent works." As far as inter-religious politics is concerned, that may or may not be true. I wasn't at the negotiations, either then or now, so I am in no position to pontificate. Apparently you were.

On the other hand, as far as the Bible versus critics such as myself is concerned, I have little doubt what you say is false. The NIV, the Living Bible, and the Bible in Basic English are prime examples of books composed with extra-biblical politics in mind. If you don't wish to believe what I am saying, that is your choice. But there is no doubt in my mind, based upon the words, phrases, and paragraph structure employed, that the translators had people such as myself, skeptical Christians, and people of other religious viewpoints in mind when they assembled them. That is not quite true, however, for such books as the RSV and the ASV.

Letter #693 Continues (Part g)

(After going back over material we discussed in May regarding whether or not "replenish" means people lived before Adam, DA says--Ed.),

"Good to have YW to supply a little Hebrew for us (Letter 671)... I of course point out he is telling you what has been said before, that your beloved contradiction doesn't exist.

Of course, a sizable number of Hebraic translators made a..mistake." They were/are human. They goof (sic). In a way, you seem to insist the KJV is perfect. What do we have to do to convince you it is hopelessly inferior to scads of more recent Bibles.

Editor's Response to Letter #693 (Part g)

First, as we noted in May, YW claims that the Hebrew should not have been translated into the word "replenish." In effect, he is saying he knows Hebrew better than some Hebrew scholars in so far as this translation is concerned. Maybe he does; but then, again, maybe he doesn't. That is an issue to be settled between biblicists themselves and is not my problem. All I am saying now is what I said then. The word "replenish" generates a contradiction.

Second, when you say my "beloved contradiction doesn't exist" you are whistling through the graveyard. You only have YW's word to go on. You are telling me "a sizable number of Hebraic translators made a..mistake" and you admit you don't even know Hebrew. Rather presumptuous, don't you think? What are your qualifications as a Greek/Hebrew translator? None!

Third, I didn't know it was my beloved contradiction. I have no more affection for it than thousands of others that are readily available. Why would I show it any more attention than the rest? Do you have any data to substantiate this gratuitous observation or is it based on mere "gut reaction"?

Fourth, you say I "seem to insist the KJV is perfect." When did I say the KJV is perfect or even imply as much. I said there is virtually nothing in the KJV that is not in one or more modern versions. You and some of your apologetic compatriots try to give people the impression that this translation disagreement is a battle between the KJV in one corner and all the modern versions in the other, which is far from reality. How many times have I listed one or more 20th century versions of the Bible that corroborate the KJV translation of this or that? The KJV is by no means all alone and if you wish to retain some integrity I would suggest that you stop trying to paint it as such. You are more than willing to throw it in the dumpster every time you encounter a bind.

Fifth, you say, "What do we have to do to convince you it is hopelessly inferior to scads of more recent Bibles." It is? Name some of these scads. You might want to make that argument to Dr. Peter Ruckman, David Otis Fuller, Edward Hills, John Burgon, Robert Barnett and Norman Ward, all of whom are King James Only advocates and have written extensively on the fallacy of the point you just flippantly proffered. From their perspective it is the only one that is accurate. All the others that should be dumpsterized. I am by no means as willing to discard the King James as you are when it comes to biblical analysis. Just because you want to throw it out of the building don't expect me to open the window.

Letter #693 Continues (Part h)

Of course YW has his own errors when he ventures past his knowledge.

(He says--Ed/), "profit-driven Bible translators who have their own agenda." This is something of a contradiction. Unless their agenda is profit (quite possible, but not what YW seems to have in mind), they are either not profit-driven, or do not have their own agenda.

"..and know it's all a load of crap.." After his experiences, he ought to realize they know nothing of the sort. People can be very firm in believing what they want to in spite of the most obvious facts. You and I know that (tho we have a minor disagreement over who is the pig-headed jackass.)

Editor's Response to Letter #693 (Part h)

Your criticisms of what YW said are between you and him. He might decide to respond. Your final remark is more in the nature of an admission than an accusation, wouldn't you agree. After all you did admit to being a nut in Part j of this letter (in the next issue), didn't you? Although that kind of characterization is quite prevalent in your letters, I think you have pretty well located to whom it aptly applies. After all, who am I to contest an observation made by someone who is in a better position to know than anyone.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #694 from RN of Moscow, Idaho

Dear Dennis. I enclose a check for $20 for which please send me a couple of your videos.... We hope to show them on the public access channel on the local TV cable. (What follows is my analysis of "THE HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS"--Ed.)

Most Christian bookstores sell what is known as "harmonies of the gospels." These books purport to put the contents of the four gospels into one continuous account. This is supposed to serve two purposes: one, to be a sort of "reader's digest" of the gospels for people who have little time to read; two, to smooth out, or "harmonize," the contradiction among the gospels.

Although several dozen of these harmonies are currently available, new ones continue to be written in the hope that someone will finally determine what "really" happened in the gospel stories. But this is a vain hope, because back in the middle of the second century A.D. the gospels already contradicted each other. And if they were not the original manuscripts, they were certainly very early copies of them.

So about the year 160 a Christian writer called Tatian compiled the very first "harmony of the gospels." He picked out the events and sayings that appealed to him and left out the rest. But other Christians did not agree with his choices, so they have been playing the same, old, no-win game of "harmonizing the gospels" ever since. The gospels cannot be harmonized because they have contradicted each other from the very beginning.

(What follows is my analysis entitled LIES ABOUT THE BIBLE--Ed.)

LIE: The Bible is without error or contradiction

FACT: The Bible is filled with errors and contradictions from cover to cover.

LIE: The Bible consists of exactly 66 books.

FACT: The Jewish Bible has 39 books; the Catholic Bible, 72; some Protestants Bibles, 66. The 1611 KJV has 72 books in it.

LIE: The Bible is the "Word of God."

FACT: Nowhere does the Bible make such a claim

LIE: The OT contains many prophecies about Jesus of Nazareth.

FACT: There is not a single reference to Jesus in the OT

LIE: The OT teaches that there is life after death.

FACT: In the entire OT no one dies and goes to heaven. And there is no hell in the OT religion. Death is the end. (Except in Daniel, ca. 167 B.C., the latest book in the OT)

Beware of evangelists who lie about the Bible. They are wolves in sheep's clothing. They just want your mind and your money.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #693 from DA of La Puente, California Continues from Last Month (Part i)

The presence of critics such as yourself produces more accurate Bibles, not faking it. Faking it is far more common when religion rules the roost. Nobody was going to challenge the fake, so the faker could expect to get away with it. By contrast, the presence of critics means that the faker is being watched. How is he to get his fake accepted at all? You will be pouncing on it 1st thing. It is perhaps ironic that those attempting to destroy the Bible are in fact also improving it. Each act of criticism is a spur to show the criticism unjustified. & (sic) sometimes those spurs work. Errors are detected, and corrected. The modern Bible is more accurate in part because of generations of atheists who have said it was inaccurate.

Editor's Response to Letter #693 (Part i)

What a speech! Looks good on paper. Too bad it has almost nothing to do with reality as is so true of nearly everything else you concoct. Atheists, agnostics, humanists, and other freethinkers do not make a habit of going through ancient manuscripts and documents to find errors in biblical translations. Most have little or no interest in the Book and many find it to be childish, superstitious, fanciful, silly, boring, repetitious, and contradictory. Just getting them to read it is quite a challenge as I have discovered to my chagrin. For many, the less they have to do with the Bible the better they like it. So, for you to say critics such as myself are finding mistakes in ancient manuscripts and the like and causing them to be corrected is erroneous.

Second, the absence of people such as myself in the days of King James caused translations to be more in tune with the manuscripts, warts and all. The incentive to alter what the manuscripts were saying just wasn't there, even though the language was often raw and the inconsistencies anything but rare.

Third, "faking it" is not the problem; expediency is. In many respects the earliest translators were more honest and closer to the manuscripts being translated than those who imbibed much later. Because so many of the manuscripts were plagued by repulsive terminology and contradictory data that was becoming increasingly noticed by growing numbers of biblicists and non-biblicists alike, more and more apologists, especially in this century, decided to create new versions of the Bible in order to remove or ameliorate many embarrassments. Some 20th century translators have been much more involved in this skullduggery than others.

Fourth, another major factor accounting for so many recent translations is the failure of various groups and denominations to arrive at theological agreements. In order to foster their own particular theology, different denominations have seen fit to commission their own version of the Bible. The Jehovah's Witnesses denomination is a prime example. Theology rather than concern for textual accuracy was the prime motivation. The Bible had to be brought into line with what they wanted

Fifth, you say, "The modern Bible is more accurate in part because of generations of atheists who have said it was inaccurate." What modern Bible? What are you talking about? Are you talking about a currently circulating Bible that is an exact replica of the alleged original? If so, where is this modern Bible? I need a copy immediately. Apparently you are referring to one of the versions on the market. In that case, please, by all means, tell me which one is "the" Bible. Again, you appear to have not read our back issues. Did you read the issues that exposed the clashes that exist between the major versions on the market? I think not. If you did, then tell us which is an exact copy of "THE BIBLE"?

And lastly, you say, "The modern Bible is more accurate...." More accurate than what? The King James? Says who? Do you know that there is almost no part of the King James that is not duplicated in one or more recent translations.

Letter #693 from DA Concludes From Last Month (Part j)

Letter #674. Most distressing. Not because JS calls me a nut. Of course I am. Otherwise I wouldn't be writing you. But he says you used to be less willing to attack people's motivation. In other words, you have gone downhill with time. Not only is attacking motivation a classic fallacy, you are decidedly inaccurate in guessing the motivation of those who write you.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #693 (Part j)

You admit you are a nut! Well, at least we don't have that hurdle to clear. You say you are a nut; otherwise, you wouldn't be writing to BE. I can readily understand your motivation. You are seeking therapy and you've come to the right place for precisely the ill that ails you. Our first prescription is that you read all of our back issues followed by a long rest. You will need it in order to recover from the shock of exiting the realm of fantasy and entering the sphere of reality. For many that is more than their constitution can endure. Hopefully you can bridge the chasm without too much trauma. That should certainly go a long way toward expelling that biblical malignancy currently in possession of your psyche.

Secondly, apparently you didn't notice that I made no comment in support of the observation by JS, and the reason is quite simple. I wasn't aware of any change in the policy I have followed for nearly 14 years. Being involved in motivations, ulterior motives, and psychological stimulations have never been much of a factor on my radar screen. They are not only too hard to fathom but too irrelevant to consider. BE can be employed for self-induced therapy, but its author does not view himself as a psychologist or psychiatrist.

Dear Dennis. I hadn't intended to write you, but two things have happened since I last wrote, which I feel should be brought to your attention. First, in connection with your response to letter #684 (Part c), BE #164-2. Yes, I know you have dealt with the question of how Jesus could be in the tomb "3 days and 3 nights," if he was crucified on a Friday and rose again on Sunday. I would first ask you: where in the Bible does it say that Jesus was crucified on a Friday? Answer: nowhere. I bring this up because the other day I happened to be surfing the cable TV channels, and on one of the local public access channels, there, of all people, was Jimmy Swaggart, the prototypical charlatan preacher. And yet, he had the most plausible explanation of the "resurrection dilemma" I've ever heard: JESUS WASN'T CRUCIFIED ON A FRIDAY AT ALL; HE WAS CRUCIFIED ON A WEDNESDAY. Why do I say this? Well, as Swaggart pointed out, Jesus was actually crucified on what was called "The High Sabbath of the Passover". This was the evening before the start of Passover, which began (and still begins) on the 14th day of Nisan, not necessarily on a Friday.... I say again: WHERE IN THE BIBLE DOES IT SAY THAT JESUS WAS CRUCIFIED ON A FRIDAY? I have seen your 'explanation many times in BE over the years, but not once have you addressed the explanation that Swaggart made. Can you do so now?

Editor's Response to Letter #695 (Part a)

Dear NB. I'd be glad to, although we thoroughly covered this issue and the Wednesday defense long ago. You might want to read the appropriate issues.

First, you ask where does it say he was killed on a Friday. Well we might begin with the 15th chapter of Mark which, while describing the crucifixion, says in the 42nd verse,

"And now when the evening was come, because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath."

Since the sabbath is Saturday, the day before the sabbath would be Friday. After describing the crucifixion Luke 23:54 says,

"And that day was the preparation, and the Sabbath drew on."

And while describing the crucifixion John 19:31 says,

"The Jews, therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the Sabbath day ... besought Pilate that ... they might be taken away."

So Friday was the big day, not Wednesday. That's why Christians celebrate Good Friday, not Good Wednesday.

Second, what on earth is the "High Sabbath of the Passover"? I can't find that phrase anywhere. It's not in Strong's Concordance. Either I missed something or Swaggart decided the way to escape the problem was to concoct a concept. What are you talking about and where is it in Scripture?

Third, as I showed long ago the Sabbath was always on a Saturday, except for some special sabbaths discussed in the Book of Leviticus that only occurred in the 7th month. Since Jesus was crucified at the time of the Passover which only occurred during the first month, these special (possibly non-Saturday) sabbaths are ruled out and only the normal Saturday sabbaths are ruled in.

Letter #695 Continues (Part b)

The second thing has to do with the problem of "an omnipotent God being able to set a task which he himself is unable to do", such as creating a rock so heavy not even God can lift it, or creating a two-sided triangle, etc. Setting aside the fact that two-sided triangles do in fact exist in "Elliptic Geometry," you had a pretty good go-around on this with my friend.

Editor's Response to Letter #695 (Part b)

Before we proceed I would rather not set aside your assertion that "two-sided triangles do in fact exist." I was a math major in college for a short while and I never saw a two-sided triangle in any kind of geometry, plane, solid or otherwise. According to my Webster's New World Dictionary a "triangle" is specifically defined as "a geometrical figure having three angles and three sides. Any three-sided or three cornered figure ...etc." How could you have a two-sided figure which by definition is three-sided? How could you have a two-sided three-sided figure? Sort of like having an all black, white horse, isn't it? The lengths to which some people will go to defend that book are downright unnerving.

Letter #695 Concludes (Part c)

But what brings this up now is that as I was watching the proceedings of the House of Representatives on C-SPAN on July 11, Rep. Toby Roth was droning on about some obscure bill, when he suddenly chose to reveal that he was taught by Jesuits, and the Jesuits taught him that "not even God can square a circle". I almost dropped out of my chair.... They're the last persons I would expect to assert that there is something that "not even God can do." ...I'm wondering if there is any light that you can shed on this notion of the Jesuits that there is something that their God can't do.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #695 (Part c)

Rather than dropping out of your chair, rising to cheer would have been more appropriate. Isn't it nice to know that the Jesuits are not quite as divorced from reality as they're depicted?

Letter #696 from DA of La Puente, Cali-fornia (Part a)

(On page 2 of the 151st issue I quoted Eccle. 1:9

(RSV) which says,

"What has been is what will be, and what has been done is what will be done; there is nothing new under the sun."

Then I wanted to know how many cities had an atomic bomb dropped on them prior to 1945 and how many people walked on the moon before 1969. Rev. BB provided a weak response and DA provided even weaker support of Rev. BB. DA now wishes to redeem his ego by saying--Ed.),

Eccle. 1:9

"...nothing new under the sun."

You claim that "For the first time in history man set foot on the moon. That's what's new! That's what changed!"

So what? As the poet put it, "I went out the same door I came in by." What has really changed? You get up in the morning, go to work, come home, go to bed. How has going to the moon changed your life? Or changed much of anything? It was just a great feat, not a change. But when we classify it as a feat, we find that great feats happen all the time. The details may vary, but they are indeed

A man goes to the moon. A man sails around the world. Both just feats, and both nothing new, despite never having been done before.

Editor's Response to Letter #696 (Part a)

I say "that's what changed" and you respond with "so what." Instead of denying it's new, you focused on discounting its importance. Apparently you are un-able to realize that its importance is irrelevant. I don't know what its value is and for purposes of this discussion I couldn't care less. Who cares how it has changed our lives? I said it was new. I didn't say it was important. As usual you employed your fast foot shuffle and changed the point at issue. You say "it was just a great feat, not a change." How wrong can you get! You are unbelievable DA. It's been years since I have confronted such an intractable ideologue. You will argue with blatant facts staring you in the face. You don't even have enough savvy to know when to hold them and when to fold them. If you are going to make a stand for Jesus, believe me this is not the place to dig in. It certainly was a change. Footprints were left on the moon's surface and they weren't there before. You are trying to make the issue one of importance as opposed to innovation. I don't care how important it was. It was new, wasn't it!

And to top it all off, your final comment is the mother of all brain twisters--"both nothing new, despite never having been done before." You want us to believe that although its never been done before it's not new? Speaking of the moon, sometimes your thought processes are so far out in space I can't help but feel the astronauts took your reasoning skills on their ride to moon and left them there.

Letter #696 Continues (Part b)

(On page 3 in the 152nd Issue I noted the conflict between Jesus' comment in Matt. 28:19 (

"Go ye there-fore and teach all nations baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost"

) and Paul's assertion in I Cor. 1:14, 17 (

"I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius. ...For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel"

). DA sought to reconcile this contradiction in issue #162 and now wishes to return to the encounter by saying--Ed.),

Among other things, your conflict depends on "baptise" being the top priority, indeed, sole priority. We have no showing of that. Quite the contrary.

If a CEO gave a sales pep talk and told everybody to sell, sell, sell, we would routinely assume he is not talking to his accounting department, who are expected to remain at their desks and do non-selling activities, as are many other employees. Even within the sales department, many told to sell are expected to be doing other duties either full or part time. No contradiction exists when the CEO then selects as employee of the month somebody who has done very little sales.

Jesus fits in nicely as the CEO here. He issues or-ders to baptise, preach, give alms, love god, man.... There is, accordingly no clear requirement that a particular follower, Paul in this case, has to follow a particular order to the exclusion of the others, and Paul tells us his prime directive was to preach.

Editor's Response to Letter #696 (Part

I don't know which is worse, DA, your wholly un-textual assumptions, your poor logic, your bad writing, or your bogus analogies.

First, where does "priority," much less top priority, come into the picture? The text says nothing whatever about any order of magnitude of importance. My argument has nothing to do with, and is in no way dependent upon, "baptise being the top priority, indeed, sole priority."

Second, from whence comes this departmentaliza-tion nonsense? Jesus gave an order to his followers in Matt. 28:19 and there is nothing whatever in the text to justify your contention that his instruction was only in-tended for a certain segment. Where did Jesus make this division or distinction?

Third, if what you said were true, then Jesus specifically told some group or other that they were not to engage in baptizing. Where, when, and to whom did he say that? If he did not single out anyone or any group, then Matt. 28:19 must have been intended for all his followers.

Fourth, since we are on this poorly conceived analogies business, we should note that you say, "No contradiction exists when the CEO then selects as employee of the month somebody who has done very little sales." What does employee of the month and volume of sales have to do with the issue? How are they analogous? And if anything we wouldn't be talking about "employee of the month;" we would be talking about "sales employee of the month." Remember we are talking about one mission-baptism-or in the case of your analogy sales. And that excludes the accounting department. But you tried to cover yourself with some more fancy footwork by saying the "CEO then selects as employee of the month somebody who has done very little sales." In other words, somebody in the ac. counting department who is also selling. But to the extent that he is selling he is not an accountant. You are back to having everyone do everything and have nullified your whole argument.

Fifth, you say, "There is, accordingly no clear requirement that a particular follower, Paul in this case, has to follow a particular order to the exclusion of the others." Oh I am afraid there is, unless you can prove the instructions given by Jesus in Matt. 28:19 only applied to a specific group of his followers and excluded Paul. And that you can't do because no part of Scripture will support you.

Sixth and lastly, your final sentence only adds to your sophistic pile. What Paul said about preaching is not even the issue. It is neither relevant nor material, while what he said about baptism is both relevant and material. Always trying to channel us down back alleys, side roads, detours, and off the beaten paths, aren't you! Tangents are your speciality. Paul said he was not sent to baptise when Jesus sent every follower to do just that according to Matt. 28:19.

Letter #696 Continues (Part c)

(Still trying to dig his way out DA seeks to defend his statement in the June issue that since "Paul was not present at Matt. 28:19, I was under the burden of showing that Paul was in fact ordered to baptize." I replied by saying, "So Paul was not present at Matt. 28? Well, 1, along with millions of others, wasn't with Moses on Mt. Sinai or with Jesus when he delivered the Sermon on the Mount; so I guess that relieves us of those responsibilities." Now DA says--Ed.), Possibly. Possibly not. In each case we need to decide if the orders in question still apply, and that can't be done on an automatic basis.

You of course like to call this dodging, but it is the normal practice with any set of orders. They routinely deal with both the temporary and the permanent. Some of the orders are void after a certain time, do not apply to certain groups, etc. It can be dodging, but it is also the normal practice of all mankind and can't be sustained as a contradiction.

Editor's Response to Letter #696 (Part c)

Boy are you trying to tip toe past this one! You know you have a marvelous facility for getting yourself out of a hole only to fall into a canyon. Remember when I told you, "Don't you think any further ahead" than the next sentence?" But you have done went and did it again. The principle you just laid down will play havoc with the Bible and its defenders. There are liter-ally thousands of maxims, rules, instructions, and teachings in the Bible that would be up for grabs, if your policy were to prevail. How are you going to separate that which applies to everyone from that which applies only to those being addressed at that particular time? What's your criteria and who is going to make that determination? You will all but destroy the authority and effectiveness of biblical teachings in thousands of instances. In far too many cases, if someone did not like a teaching being thrown in his or her face, they could easily respond by saying, it only applies to, or was only meant for, people being addressed at that particular time thousands of years ago. It's no longer ap-plicable. Don't you realize you are arguing for situa-tional ethics which fundamentalists deplore. But, then, maybe you are not a fundamentalist, although I am in-clined to believe otherwise.

Secondly, when Jesus gives instructions to his fol-lowers, they are intended to apply to all of his follow-ers, unless you can find Scripture to the contrary. Matt. 28:19 is a good example of a universal command. There is nothing in the verse or related verses that would restrict the baptismal instruction to a select group of people. If you say it did not apply to all of his followers, then I could apply the same principle to most of the NT and nearly all of his admonitions. With defenders like you the Bible wouldn't need critics like me-

Letter #696 Concludes (Part d)

(On the fifth page in the June issue I asked DA, "How do you know Paul was afraid he would divide the church by baptizing? Would you be so kind as to cite chapter and verse for that observation?" DA says--Ed.),

First Cor. 1:11-17 seems to say that.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #696 (Part d)

I can't help but notice that you inserted the word seems" because you are not very convinced of your own argument. And with good reason because in the 14th and 15th verses to which you allude Paul gives a more explicit reason by saying,

"I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius; Lest any should say that I baptized in mine own name."

He does not want people to think he is baptizing in his own name rather than the name of Christ. In other words he is more concerned with people thinking he is getting a "bighead" than dividing the church.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #697 from FN of Huntsville, Texas

(In the August issue FN sent us a letter which said, "I am a freethinker incarcerated in the Texas penal system which doesn't pay its inmates. We are provided the basics only, except for orthodox religious literature.... I am unable to compensate you at this time.... Any issue outdated or otherwise in any condition of your "Biblical Errancy" publication will be read and shared with the few freethinkers here..." I responded by saying, We sympathize with your plight and for that reason have decided to give you a six month subscription gratis. This prompted FN to send the following letter--Ed.).

Thanks for the six months. It's not often that I even receive an answer much less a book, magazine, or newsletter. There seems to be, even among freethinkers, an attitude that only misfits are in prison and if the state has'em in there they need to be and do not warrant consideration any longer. With the non-thinkers I understand--but when freethinkers act in such a manner it's surprising....

"Of course, every man in jail is in favor of liberty, as a prejudice,--but it takes a far grander man who is not in jail, to fight and suffer for a man who is." R.G. Ingersoll.

Editor's Response to Letter #697

FN. I don't know why you are in there and am not really concerned. But I do know there is an extremely high probability you will be out with the rest of us someday. So, there is no sense in letting your mind go to waste, when you have time to learn the truth. It could very well help forestall a possible reincarceration. If we had the money, we would distribute more free subscriptions to inmates. Serving time doesn't mean you exit life.

Letter #698 from EE of Dayton, Ohio

... I pray and hope that there will be more Biblical Errancy programs in the future. Your programs are definitely what should be taught during Wednesday evening and Sunday morning Bible classes. I believe that the information you express on your program may get many upset but do not let their words upset you or revile you. Isa. 51:7 and Luke 6:22 explain that we should not fear the reproach of men, neither be afraid of their revilings or abuse.

"Blessed are ye, when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you and cast out your name as evil."

May Peace Be Upon You.

Editor's Response to Letter #698

Dear EE. You are living proof that some Christians not only watch our TV programs but definitely feel they are needed. Showing programs on TV is not an exercise in futility by any means, as some have alleged. I often hear freethinkers assert that talking to biblicists is a waste of time because "you can't change those people." I have never agreed with that contention and never will. As I have said before. I have never been to an atheist meeting in my life in which nearly all of the participants did not come out of some sort of religious background. And if they can make it over the wall so can others.

EDITOR'S NOTE: I would STRONGLY encourage everyone in sympathy with the goals and philosophy of this periodical to buy a computer and a modem, obtain a service provider, and learn how to carry our cause to the world of biblicism by going on-line. Let's face it. Most freethinkers have very little, if any, contact with Bible adherents. Those are not the circles in which we circulate. But with the Internet a whole new world is opened up in which you can meet hundreds of firm believers in the Bible, whom you certainly don't know and would never meet otherwise, but who are greatly in need of the information only you can provide. I urge all of our subscribers and readers to make an effort to learn how it's done. Believe me; it's well worth the time if you are into dialogue. Four years ago I thought of the Internet as little more than a fad and I had almost no interest in pursuing it further, after some brief encounters. Boy, have I changed. I am now having some difficulty trying not to become excessively involved. I am constantly getting electronic mail (e-mail) requests from my subscribers to provide them with information to debate some apologist with whom they are interacting on the Internet. Many of you have been with me for years and couldn't help but have a vast and potent body of anti-bible information that other freethinkers could use. Many of you have bought and read my book as well as scores of issues and audio tapes. Some of you have used our material to develop your own tactics for biblical encounters. Some of you just love to debate scripture. No matter what your inclination or capabilities, those battling the religious crowd on the Internet need your assistance and what better way to help than by joining in. You are badly needed, because our troops are significantly outnumbered.

While on the Internet you can go into Christian newsgroups, or what are really bulletin boards, and post some powerful stuff. You can respond when they reply, pick a topic where you think they are weak, and pounce on points where they have left themselves open. You can focus on the Bible, Jesus, atheism, humanism, or any one of hundreds of other religious topics. It is all up to you. Some of the apologists I've encountered know the book, so you will have to do your homework. But once you are on-line you can debate people throughout the world on virtually every religious/biblical topic imaginable. The sky is the limit. BE could even act as a clearing house should you so desire by providing your e-mail address to others of our persuasion who need your assistance or vice versa. We are in terrible need of teamwork and the Internet is an excellent way to proceed. And don't think you are too old or inept to learn. It is not that hard. Nor is it that expensive. You'll need to purchase a computer that can use a modem, a modem (a device that allows you to communicate to the world through your telephone line), and pay a monthly bill to a service provider who will hook you up with thousands. Well known providers are America On-Line and CompuServe. You can possibly avoid the monthly bill by finding a library or some other agency that provides the service free. But by all means get involved. This whole enterprise has real potential.

Even as I was writing this, I received some e-mail from a strong supporter outlining his response to a biblicist who claimed biblical critics interpret Scripture too literally. His response was good and could be relayed to other BE supporters to use as the need arises.

Dec. 1996

A national periodical focusing on Biblical errors, contradictions, and fallacies, while providing a hearing for apologists

COMMENTARY

This issue will conclude for the time being our on-going policy of devoting an entire issue to letters from some of our readers.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #699 from DA of La Puente, California (Part a)

Dear McKinsey. You are really steamed over your "mistreatment" at the hands of the Christian Research Journal, but that treatment is identical to what you dish out to writers to your own periodical. You always get the last word, and you decide how many, if any, and which ones, of any critics' response gets printed. & (sic) you print nowhere near all the critic sends to you, or wants printed. "..it would only be fair if I were given the last word..." which you never give anyone writing to you.

Editor's Response to Letter #699 (Part a)

Dear DA. I'm wondering how you can make these accusations without ever having been in our office or seen our mail? Boy, are you off base! What did you decide to do? Just take a lot of shots in the dark and see if you could hit something? You might be interested in knowing that you missed on every round fired but one.

First, I do determine what goes into the periodical; that's true. But that's by no means anywhere near as sinister as you try to imply. Over the years I have made a scrupulous attempt to include virtually every letter sent to this publication. In fact, I have used so many that my current supply has been reduced to the bare minimum. The only letters excluded over the years have been those which were irrelevant, immaterial, incoherent, poorly written, too verbose or specifically excluded by request from the source.

Second, I get the last word in an individual issue, since I don't know of any other practical way it can be done, do you? If someone feels I got the last word unfairly, they are more than welcome to write another letter criticizing my closing in the prior issue. Some people, such as yourself, have done just that, as this very letter demonstrates. This tete a tete can go on quite a while. But I can't remember when I was the one who terminated the process. I need and expect critical letters and do not make a point of discouraging critics. Indeed, without them my Dialogue and Debate section would vanish and that would be unacceptable. Contrary to your unwarranted vilification, I did not get from CRI what I "dish out" nor do I necessarily get the last word.

Third, you allege that I "print nowhere near all the critic sends" to me. Wrong again. Except for critics, such as yourself, who think BE is a publication of 66 pages rather than 6, I can't think of anyone over the years who has not had nearly all of his material printed. In fact, a couple have had more printed than they preferred and sent me a subsequent letter expressing some displeasure. I need critical material. As I said, it is an inseparable part of this publication. How am I going to show biblicists the error of their ways, if I never hear from them and never confront their mistakes and misconceptions. D and D is of critical importance and I am not about to discourage critics from writing as a result of not addressing their letters. D and D deals with people where they are in order to escort them to where they should be.

Fourth, the word "steamed" is not only inaccurate but hyperbolic, unless, of course, you choose to characterize every objection as being "steamed." It connotes an aura of emotional outrage that is not in keeping with either my style or demeanor. If I was really "steamed," you'd know it by the employment of terminology that would be considerably less civil than you have experienced do far. Simply put, you overdramatized to the point of being deceptive and this is by no means the only time you have subtly invoked this underhanded ploy.

Letter #699 Continues (Part b)

(In my response to Letter #678 I said, "Rarely is the KJV out on a limb all by its lonesome as is so commonly alleged by many biblicists." DA says in reply--Ed.).

It is rarely on its lonesome because it has been the most popular and influential Bible in English for centuries. Accordingly, its errors have been copied many times by many successors. But that does not alter the basic situation. The KJV is frequently wrong, and an error in the KJV is only an error in that book, not an error in the Bible.

Editor's Response to Letter #699 (Part b)

Now you are telling me the Greek and Hebraic translators of modern versions agreeing with the KJV are incompetent. You mean all they did to create modern versions was take the KJV off the shelf and duplicate its text. From whence comes that piece of wisdom? Any high school student could have done that. Versions are created by going back to manuscripts, codices, uncials, minuscules, papyri, and lectionaries written in Greek and Hebrew, not by taking an already existing version and copying its text.

Just because the KJV has been "the most popular and influential Bible in English for centuries" does not mean the creators of the modern versions to which you are referring immediately went to the KJV to discover what to say. Not by a long ways. There are thousands of extant manuscripts that are considerably closer to the "alleged" originals. Why would they bother to improve on what they had if all they intended to do was update the verbiage and copy the text of the KJV without checking its reliability with other sources closer to the alleged originals?

You assert quite authoritatively that the KJ's "errors have been copied many times by many successors." How do you know that? Where did you get that information? Were you on the translation committees? Were you even present when the translations were assembled? Of course not! You have already admitted that you don't even read Greek or Hebrew. You are talking through your hat again.

And then you say that "an error in the KJV is only an error in that book, not an error in the Bible." You don't know that either. More whistling in the dark! We have been over this ploughed ground repeatedly. As I have said several times before, how do you know the contents of any version is not an accurate reflection of the originals, since the originals no longer exist and copyist errors cannot be proven? Until you can make that comparison, that verification, we are left with nothing more than contradictions staring us in the face. You want us to replace contradictions in front of our eyes with theories, conjectures and speculations on what could have been. That's not how it is done, my friend. Until you come up with something tangible and quantifiable, the contradictions stand out bold as brass.

Letter #699 Continues (Part c)

(DA notes that in the same prior response I said, "The ASV [American Standard Version] and the NASB [New American Standard Bible] are especially powerful support for the King James" and then continues by saying--Ed.),

Which is why the KJV is such a weak source. Neither of these powerful supports is much more than a rewrite job, designed to modernize the language more than correct any flaws. To lean on them is to lean on a broken reed. Granted, that does make them superior to the Living Bible you also mention, which has been de-rided as having errors as frequent as the water in the sea. But the point remains that these supporters are not able to do much supporting.

Editor's Response to Letter #699 (Part c)

The more you speak DA, the more you expose your inadequacies. The ASV is the American Version of the English Revised Version of 1885. Let me quote what even the apologists McDowell and Stewart are willing to concede on pages 50-52 of their book entitled Reasons Skeptics Should Consider Christianity.

"The publication of the KJV of 1611 did not mark the end of new translations of the Bible. Sixteen years after the release of the Authorized Version (KJV), a 5th century Greek manuscript (Codex Alexandrinus) was brought to England. This manuscript was centuries closer in time to the writing of the NT than the handful of manuscripts used to translate the KJV. Moreover, the Greek Codex Alexandrinus was different in certain respects than the text which was used to translate the KJV.

During the next two and one half centuries, a great number of other new manuscripts were discovered, some dating as early as the middle of the 4th century (Codex Vaticanus, A.D. 325; Codex Siniaticus, A.D. 350).

With these discoveries and a refining of the science of textual criticism, it was inevitable, and even desirable, that voices would cry out for a revision of the KJV.

The purpose of the revision committee was revealed in a report submitted on May 3, 1870 by the Canterbury Committee.... 1. That it is decided that a revision of the KJV of the Holy Scriptures be undertaken.... 3. That in the above resolutions we do not contemplate any new translation of the Bible, or any alteration of the language, except when in the judgment of the most competent scholars such change is necessary....Any changes from the King James were to be done only when absolutely necessary....If such evidence warranted a change, the approval of at least two-thirds of the revisers was required before it would be incorporated into the text. The actual number of changes far exceeded the original expectations of the committee, but most of the numerous changes were merely grammatical (i.e., word order, sentence structure)....

The great value of the RV is that it set a precedent for further translations which could incorporate the latest manuscript and linguistic and historical evidence into their versions.

Regarding the NASB they say on page 71, "...the translators of the NASB attempted to bring the American Standard Version up to date, to be as faithful to the original languages as possible, and to present a clear and readable style...."

In essence, the above shows that you erred grievously when you asserted, "Neither of these powerful supports is much more than a rewrite job, designed to modernize the language more than correct any flaws." They most assuredly were designed to correct any flaws. In fact, that is precisely why they were written. They were designed not only to correct flaws but modernize language and the very fact that the overwhelming bulk of the changes dealt only with grammar and word order changes testifies to the KJV's basic reliability. New manuscript discoveries made in the 300 years following 1611 revealed the need for linguistic changes. You imply that the creators of the ASV and the NASB simply went back to the KJV and rewrote off the top of their head somehow what they thought needed rewriting. No they didn't. They went back to the manuscripts that were available, especially those discovered since the KJV was published, and made the needed corrections. The KJV was not their criteria for accuracy, as you strongly imply; the manuscripts were. When you say "a rewrite job," a rewrite job based on what, if not ancient manuscripts and new discoveries.

Then you say, "But the point remains that these supporters are not able to do much supporting." Wrong again. The very fact that they did not change the KJV significantly, other than in word order and sentence structure etc., even after 300 years of new manuscript discoveries, is excellent proof that the KJV was essentially correct from the start. The revisers were not wedded to the KJV. In fact, they were specifically told to correct it wherever necessary and the fact that the changes they made rarely went beyond grammar and sentence structure is potent proof that the KJV had it together from the beginning as far as the creators of the ASV and the NASB were concerned.

(On page 2 of the July issue I said, "Remember what I said long ago? You could be the world's greatest Greek/Hebrew scholar and still find experts disagreeing with your interpretation. If you press your point (of saying I have to prove there is a contradiction in the originals--Ed.), instead of reconciling the problem, you will only succeed in proving the verse needs to be expunged from the Bible. That's the best you can hope for. The sentence becomes worthless, because you don't know how it should be translated." DA assails this by saying--Ed.),

Now there are two answers to that. a) We often do know which is the correct translation. Such matters have been studied for lifetimes, and answers discovered. We do not need to just throw up our hands when we discover that 2 different versions have different language. And b) You are asserting there are contradictions in the Bible, not obscurities. Accordingly, you are asserting that the meaning of the conflicting passages can be established. So you must abandon the claim for contradiction if you want to push a claim of obscurity....

Editor's Response to Letter #699 (Part d)

You have an overriding propensity to sophistically shift the focus every time a problem comes your way, DA. We aren't talking about instances in which the translation is not disputed. You know that as well as I. We are talking about instances in which it is up for grabs and fosters divergent translations. You focused on disagreements which can be reconciled in an attempt to give the impression that this is true of all conflicts in general, which is miles from reality. Your claim that "We do not need to just throw up our hands when we discover that 2 different versions have different language" is patently false in many key instances. Experts disagree on how many verses should be translated. Don't you understand that? So who is correct? If they all agreed, then you could keep your hands down. But since they don't, you are well within your prerogatives to raise them.

Secondly where did you get the idea that the only conflicts are between different versions. You are way off base again. Many contradictions are within versions, not between versions. Indeed, in so far as numbers within the same version are concerned, they are often in conflict. Entire versions of the Bible are internally contradictory, even though they were translated from beginning to end by the same people.

As far as your part b) is concerned you are continuing to play your game. In reference to me you say, "You are asserting there are contradictions in the Bible, not obscurities. Accordingly, you are asserting that the meaning of the conflicting passages can be established." In truth, I am not "asserting that the meaning of the conflicting passages can be established." Those who translated the verses in question are making that claim. They must be; otherwise, why would they have translated them that way. And after they translated them that way, I am saying we are left with contradictions. So we are not dealing with obscurities; we are dealing with contradictions.

Why would I even contemplate contending they are not contradictions but obscurities? Oh I know! It's because you think I will feel that my position is somehow weak and voluntarily switch from contradictions to obscurities.

We have a group of experts creating a version of the Bible which is filled with contradictory statements. You say they are not contradictory until we know for sure how they should have been translated, and until we know for certain they are nothing more than obscurities. Wrong again! They are contradictions staring us in the face and remain as such until you prove that the translations are in error. Linguistic scholars looked at the manuscripts and translated them as they deemed most accurate. Until you prove they erred (yet you admit you are unable to read Greek or Hebrew) or produce your own group of experts who can, the contradictions remain in tact and obscurity is not a factor.

I hope you realize that this whole rigamorole you have put us through is nothing but a variation on an argument we have confronted repeatedly; namely, contradictions are due to errors in translation. If you have read our back issues in this regard, then all I can say is that you don't listen very well or read very closely. If you have not read our back issues on this topic, then you certainly should have done so before leaping into the quicksand. I am increasingly encountering defenders of the Bible who have not read BE over the years and are merely revivifying arguments that have long since been buried. To all those inclined to attack future issues of BE I say, Please read our back issues first before you pick up the poisoned pointed pen to ride out and fight for Jesus.

[After citing Ezek. 30:12 ("And I will make the rivers of Egypt dry") on page 303 in my book, I asked,

"What rivers are in Egypt other than the Nile?"

DA responds by saying,--Ed.],

The KJV may say "rivers", but the NEB says "streams" and the RSV says merely "Nile". Here too, you can't escape saying which is correct if you want to claim a contradiction.

Editor's Response to Letter #699 (Part e)

My stars! Is there no end? Always trying to shift the burden of proof, aren't you? You want me to provide the definitive and inerrant translation of your book and then claim that until I do, I can't know for certain that a contradiction exists. In effect, you want me to "perfect" your book. That's one for the books if you will pardon the pun. I addressed a variation of this ploy earlier, and either you didn't read my response or you decided to ignore it. So, for your enlightenment I'll go through it again, although I feel no obligation to do so.

I don't have to say which is correct in order to claim a contradiction exists. All I need do is expose the contradiction. Reconciliation is your problem. You deviously say humanity does not know what is the correct translation, so we can't be certain that a contradiction exists. Your strategy is inadequate in several respects.

First, as I have said before, the contradiction is staring us in the face. People who know Hebrew and Greek far better than you (which shouldn't be very difficult since you aren't knowledgeable in either) have provided what they claim is the correct translation of the manuscripts. So the contradiction stands.

Second if you are going to rely upon those instances in which the scholars are in disagreement and the translation can't be known for certain in order for me to prove a contradiction exists, then all you have done is expose a section of the Bible that should be expunged from Scripture. There is no definitive answer as to what the Bible is saying in that particular instance and the relevant verses should be deleted in order not to jeopardize biblical inerrancy. But as I said earlier, once you adopt that strategy a large part of scripture will become history, but not in the normal sense. Second Kings 8:26, for example, says Ahaziah began to rule at age 22 while the same account in 2 Chron. 22:2 says he was 42. Obviously both can't be correct. Now what are the possibilities. (a) 22 is correct and 42 is wrong, which means the Bible made a false statement. (b) 42 is correct and 22 is wrong which also means the Bible made a false statement. (c) Both say 42 in the original or both say 22 in the alleged original. But you have no way whatever of proving either part of (c), because the originals no longer exist, if they ever did. And until you can verify one or the other, the contradiction stands. I am providing tangible, verifiable, obvious contradictions that lie on the page in front of you. You, on the other hand, are providing unsubstantiated, unverifiable theories based upon nothing more than some alleged writings that you never saw a day in your life, writings everyone concedes do not exist, and you have no solid mechanism by which to prove they ever did.

With respect to my question regarding the Nile, you assert that the NEB says "streams" (plural) and the RSV says "Nile" (singular), not rivers. Don't you understand that by adopting this kind of strategy all you are doing is saying that one group of scholars knows Hebrew better than another. How do you know which is correct? How do you know either is? Perhaps there is an accurate third option? You don't know, and you never will, since the alleged originals are gone forever. As I mentioned earlier, even if you were the world's greatest scholar in one or both languages, you would still have scholars disagreeing with your translations. In effect, you would be on one team or the other. So who's correct? No one knows. And the only way to make sure the Bible is inerrant, the only way to remain on the safe side, the only way to create and maintain biblical consistency, is to expunge verses generating conflicts of this kind. Of course, once you start down this road you will all but eviscerate Scripture. There won't be enough left for a good evening's reading.

Letter #699 Continues (Part f)

& (sic) even if we decide the KJV is correct for once, the Nile within the Delta is more than one river (a common event for the delta of rivers). "Rivers of the Nile" is at least arguably correct.

Editor's Response to Letter #699 (Part f)

You paid no attention whatever to what I wrote in the July issue. Since when did the branches of a river's delta constitute many rivers? The delta at the end of the Mississippi River looks like a fan. Are you telling me each branch, each fork, of that delta is a separate river? If so, then by all means give me the names of all these rivers. I'm sure people living in that delta would like them as well.

You say "Rivers of the Nile is at least arguably correct." Another erratum. It isn't even arguably correct. The branches of a river's delta do not constitute separate rivers. They are all branches of the same river and get their water from that river.

Letter #699 Concludes (Part g)

(In Letter #679 in the June issue another apologist, NB, criticized me by saying, "whether or not the numbers in Hebrew were spelled out or not, you failed to note that 1 Kings 7:26, which makes the '2000-bath' assertion, is missing altogether from the Septuagint. You might at least have commented on why the Jewish scholars who compiled the Septuagint chose to omit this verse from the older texts. You didn't."

To this I said, "The Septuagint is nothing more than a translation like the King James, the NASB and hundreds of other versions. If I make this kind of notation with respect to the Septuagint, I might as well make it with respect to hundreds of others as well. Where would this stop? Are you saying the Septuagint is somehow more authoritative than any other translation and deserves special consideration? If so, upon what basis are you making this judgment? The reference to 2,000 baths is in the Jewish Masoretic Text. Should I have noted that also?" DA now wishes to come to NB's defense by saying--Ed),

The Septuagint is, however, over 1500 years older than the KJV (maybe 250 B.C.), making it an eyewitness by comparison. The scholar quotes the Septuagint when talking about meaning. By contrast, the KJV is quoted merely to be dismissed as wrong....

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #699 (Part g)

You say "The Septuagint is, however, over 1500 years older than the KJV." That's supposed to prove it is more accurate? Following that "logic" the King James Version should blow away all these modern versions because it's over 300 years older than they are. It is over 300 years closer to the actual events.

Secondly, you refer to the Septuagint as being "an eyewitness by comparison. Oh my goodness! Have you no sense of historical perspective and contemporaneous events? There are more years between the Septuagint and the events related by it in Genesis than there are between the Septuagint and the King James Version. You want people to believe the Septuagint is nearly an eyewitness to the The Creation Myth, the Adam and Eve tale, the Flood, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, etc.? Where on earth did you learn your biblical history? I don't even know of any fundamentalist seminaries that are that far off base.

Let's face it DA. At this stage of the game you are so all-consuming by antipathy, so blindly opposed to what I am doing, that if I said two and two is four, you would deny that emphatically by saying it's 22. Few observations are more accurate than the judicious adage that there is none so deaf as he who won't hear. And your entire line of argumentation in recent letters clearly bears this out.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #700 by E-Mail from RH of Dayton, Ohio

Hi, Dennis My Bible spouting friend on the Internet, Michael, said I was taking the matter of prayers too literally? Here is my reply.

Michael, you tell me I must take a broader view, I must not be so literal in my readings. Let's take another example. Look at Matthew 18:19 - "Again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in Heaven." OK, now I admit that I read this literally. "Literally" means "according to the letter." And to me, this verse says that two praying people who agree on what they are praying for will have their prayer granted (not answered, but granted, done) by God. This is the way I read the letters and the words which are there. You will have to educate me as to your method of more broadly and less literally reading this verse. How do you do this? Is it that after you broadly read it, it means "...it shall maybe be done for them of my Father," or perhaps "...it shall sometimes be done for them of my Father," or perhaps "...it shall be done for them of my Father if they are worthy" or perhaps "...it shall be done for them of my Father if He thinks it best" I have heard people who believe that prayers work and the Bible is true use all these rationalizations. They use them to make sense of the obvious problem that the verse says prayers will be granted, while the world shows that many prayers are not granted How would you, Michael, view this verse in your broad interpretation compared to my literal one? And wouldn't you think that any interpretation, however narrow or broad, must not change the meaning of the words that are in the verse itself? I have trouble with all these broad and non-literal readings and explanations. If you insist that to read it broadly you have to insert the sorts of weasel words that I have put between the asterisks above, then I do not see how you can avoid realizing that such a broad interpretation dramatically changes the meaning of the verse. Let us think about it; do we have any right at all to so dramatically change the meaning? In this verse, Jesus is talking to his disciples, his companions, the closest people he had to friends on earth. He wanted to convince them of just how powerful prayer was. And he told them exactly what his conviction of the degree of power of prayer: Pray together and you will get what you pray for. He was specific, he was concise, he used no other qualifying words. What would his disciples think when they heard him recite the verse? Is it not probable that they would get the impression that his words meant literally what they said, and that Jesus was telling them that when they prayed together their prayer would be granted? If you were there at the time, Michael, would you have advised them, "Well, OK, that's what our leader said, but we must not take him literally. We must take a broader view, because maybe prayers are not going to be granted in the way that he told us they would."? I do not mean to ridicule or be flippant, Michael, but how would you convince those who had heard Jesus speak these words, that they were not to be taken literally? They just heard Jesus say prayers would be granted; do you think you could convince them that he was somehow overstating the power of prayer?

Once you start on the non-literal interpretation, where do you stop? If the verse says literally "Love thy neighbor as thyself," and you decide that a broader, non-literal view must be taken, what is to stop you from using more weasel words to get its "true" broad meaning: *"Love thy neighbor as thyself when you can/*if you feel he will reciprocate */if he is a good Christian too and so on?* I think verses like these mean what they mean literally, or we can never be sure what they mean. I believe that those who wrote these books wanted us to look at what the words say, and not to add words of our own to get us past the hard parts.... For me, I admit that I can't understand how this verse could possibly be true. I can tell from it that Jesus seems to have thought it literally true and his disciples would have felt it was literally true, but my worldly experience convinces me that it is not literally true. Sure some prayers may seem to be granted, but I know of many that are demonstrably disappointing and futile. You must know this yourself, since you believe prayers are "answered in subtle ways" rather than granted. Believe this verse, believe this promise that Jesus made to his followers, and you have to believe that no such disappointments could happen. This verse, along with so many other specifics in the book, is simply not true. And to take a "broad" interpretation of it in order to make it true is to change the meaning of the verse so significantly that it can no longer mean what its original speaker and hearers thought. I welcome your thoughts on these issues, Michael, and thank you for taking the time to look them over.

COMMENTARY

Having devoted many of our prior issues to Dialogue and Debate and Letters to the Editor exclusively, we will now return to our original policy of biblical analysis through commentaries and book reviews

REVIEW

THE KINGDOM OF THE CULTS (Part 1)--One of the most famous critiques of groups pejoratively referred to by fundamentalists as cults is a 545 page book entitled The Kingdom of the Cults by Dr. Walter Martin. Known as the Bible Answer Man of Radio, Martin specialized in exposing the degree to which cult theology deviated from orthodox, fundamentalist Christianity. Although much of the book is credible from a fundamentalist perspective, many observations and conclusions contained therein need to be exposed as fallacious. Because our publication has no more empathy for the theology of cults, such as the Mormons and the Jehovah's Witnesses, than it does for Martin and fundamentalism, we have no intention of carrying a torch for the former by defending it from assaults by the latter. However, we do have a great deal of interest in revealing the degree to which Martin comes up short while accusing others of propagating lies, distortions, half truths, and perversions. He himself is by no means free from a propensity to spread erroneous theological and biblical concepts, nor does he speak accurately with respect to a variety of comments on related religious material. So that people do not become ensnared by his biblical maneuverings, we thought some critical observations are well within the realm of propriety. Throughout the book Martin occasionally made statements proving he, too, could profit from several corrective observations. What follows are some randomly chosen prominent examples of errors that can be laid at his doorstep.

First, early on Martin attempts to define cults by saying the following pages 25-28,

"There is no doubt in my mind that the belief systems of the cults share much in common, and that some of these common factors are worth noting.

First and foremost, the belief systems of the cults are characterized by close-mindedness. They are not interested in a rational cognitive evaluation of the facts. The organizational structure interprets the facts to the cultist, generally invoking the Bible and/or its respective founder as the ultimate source of its pronouncements. Such belief systems are in isolation; they never shift to logical consistency. They exist in what we might describe as separate compartments in the cultist's mind, and are almost incapable of penetration or disruption if the individual cultist is completely committed to the authority pattern of his organization.

Secondly, cultic belief systems are characterized by genuine antagonism on a personal level since the cultist almost always identifies his dislike of the Christian message with the messenger who holds such opposing beliefs.

Thirdly, almost without exception, all cultic belief systems manifest a type of institutional dogmatism and a pronounced intolerance for any position but their own.

The fourth and final point in any analysis of the belief system of cults is the factor of isolation."

Notice anything interesting about this list? Does it conjure up any images with respect to pots, kettles and the color black? Once the word "Christian" in the second point is changed to the word "opponent," it should strike a chord to those within range, because every one of these traits is applicable to nearly every fundamentalist in the land. Although no doubt typical of cults in general, these characteristics are also applicable in large measure to fundamentalist Christians. Martin would do well to take inventory of his own entourage.

Second, on page 70 Martin states,

"God the Father rained fire on Sodom and Gomorrah, and God the Son spoke and ate with Abraham and Sarah."

Where does the OT say Abraham and Sarah ate with god the son, Jesus?

Third, on page 82 Martin attacks the contention of the Jehovah's Witnesses that Christ ascended as a spirit and would only return as an invisible spirit by saying,

"Paul, contrary to Jehovah's Witnesses, never believed in an invisible return, nor did any bona fide member of the Christian Church up until the fantasies of Charles Taze Russell and his parousia nightmare, as a careful look at Paul's first epistle to the Thessalonians plainly reveals. Said the inspired Apostle,

'For this we say unto you but the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall prevent them which are asleep.

For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven [visible] with a shout [audible], with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first.'

Here we see that in perfect accord with Matthew 26 and Revelation 1 Christ is pictured as coming visibly...."

Martin accuses the Jehovah's Witnesses of acting

"at their crafty best, as they desperately attempt to make Paul teach what in all his writings he most emphatically denied, namely that Christ would come invisibly for His saints," and yet, Martin behaves no better. He inserted the word [visible] into the 16th verse, when it's not to be found in any version. Even his beloved NASB will not corroborate his textual revision. Where does 1 Thess. 4:15-16 say that Christ will be "visible" when he descends? If Martin insists upon attacking the Jehovah's Witnesses in regard to a visible versus an invisible descent, these are not the verses upon which he should have relied.

Fourth, probably the most prominent clash between orthodox Christianity and Martin on the one side and the Jehovah's Witnesses on the other concerns the nature of Jesus. Was he, or was he not, God in the flesh. The former say yes and the latter say no. In defense of a fleshly God Martin says,

"Throughout the entire content of inspired Scripture the fact of Christ's identity is clearly taught. He is revealed as Jehovah God in human form in Isa. 9:6, Micah 5:2, Isa. 7:14, John 1:1, 8:58, 17:5, Exodus 3:14, Hebrews 1:3, Philippians 2:11, Colossians 2:9, and Revelation 1:8, and 1:17-18. The Deity of Christ is one of the cornerstones of Christianity, and as such has been attacked more vigorously throughout the ages than any other single doctrine of the Christian faith. Adhering to the old Arian heresy, which Athanasius the great Church Father refuted in his famous essay 'On the Incarnation of the Word,' many individuals and all cults steadfastly deny the equality of Jesus Christ with God the Father and hence the Triune Deity. Jehovah's Witnesses, as has been observed, are no exception to this infamous rule. However, the testimony of the Scriptures stand sure and the above mentioned references alone put to silence forever this blasphemous heresy, which in the power of Satan himself deceives many with its 'deceitful handling of the Word of God.'

The Deity of Christ then is a prime answer to Jehovah's Witnesses, for if the Trinity is a reality, which it is, if Jesus and Jehovah are 'one' and the Same, then the whole frame-work of the cult collapses into a heap of shattered disconnected doctrines incapable of even a semblance of congruity. We will now consider the verses in question, and their bearing on the matter."

In order to prove Jesus is God, Martin relied on the verses listed previously. Unfortunately for him, most do not say that Jesus is God. In fact, one strongly implies the opposite. Hebrews 1:3 says ("Who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high"). How could Jesus sit down next to God if he is God. More-over, being of someone does not mean you are that someone. We often hear the expression that A is the "spittin image" of B, but that does not mean A is B. If anything, it implies the opposite. They are two separate and distinct entities.

Most of the other verses used by Martin to prove Jesus is God don't go so far as to prove the opposite, but they don't say Jesus is God either. Micah 5:2 (RSV) says, "But you, O Bethlehem Ephrathah, who are little to be among the clans of Judah, from you shall come forth for me one who is to be ruler in Israel, whose origin is from of old, from ancient days." Isa. 7:14 says, "Therefore the Lord himself shall give you a sign; Behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." John 8:58 says, "Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am." And Ex. 3:14 says, "And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM: and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you." Where do any of these verses say that Jesus is God?

Martin also cites Isa. 9:6 ("For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace") to prove Jesus is God. We showed in issue #78 on messianic prophecy that this verse could not be referring to Jesus, because he was the son, not the father.

John 17:5 says, "And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." "Before the world was" does not imply eternity because the universe existed long before this planet. Second, if Jesus is God's equivalent, why would he need to be glorified by God? And third, by saying "the glory I have with thee," two separate entities are being referred to.

The remaining verses are too nebulous to make a decision either way. Rev. 1:8 says, "I am the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty." Although the Lord is speaking, where does he equate himself with Jesus or say they are identical? On the other hand, by saying "which is to come" the parousia of Jesus does seem to be implied.

Rev. 1:17-18 says, "And when I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead. And he laid his right hand upon me, saying unto me, Fear not; I am the first and the last: I am he that liveth, and was dead; and behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death." Assuming Jesus is speaking as is alleged by biblicists, the question in this instance becomes one of determining what he means by "the first and the last." Does he mean he had no beginning and will have no ending, in which case his existence extends eternally in either direction and he is God. Or does it mean he was the first created of all those created and will be the last destroyed of all those created, in which case he is not equating himself with God, since God by definition has no beginning or end. His assertion "I am he that liveth and was dead" has no weight because of prior resurrections by others. And for him to say "I am alive for evermore" means almost nothing because that will be true of every human being who ever lives according to biblical theology. Whether you are headed toward heaven or hell, you are still immortal and alive forevermore.

Our third and final group of quotes from Martin is composed of those which can justifiably be used to argue that Jesus was God. They are among the most potent in the reservoir of orthodox fundamentalist Christianity. Prime examples are: John 1:1 ("In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God") in conjunction with verse 14, Col. 2:9 ("For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily"), and Phil. 2:11 ("And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord...").

Fifth, on page 109 Martin says,

"As I stated at the beginning of this point, it would be futile to refute all the errors of thought in Jehovah's Witnesses theology. Therefore, I have presented what I feel is sufficient evidence to show that man has an eternal soul and will abide somewhere either in conscious joy or sorrow eternally, and that those who believe and trust in Christ as their personal Savior will 'put on' that immortality when Jesus returns."

In his urge to recruit people to the cause of Jesus, Martin overstated the contribution of Jesus. He says,

"man has an eternal soul and will abide somewhere either in conscious joy or sorrow eternally."

Man is, therefore, immortal. But then he turned around and said,

"those who believe and trust in Christ as their personal Savior will 'put on' that immortality when Jesus returns."

How could they "obtain" or "put on" immortality by accepting Christ, when he just said they had an eternal soul and will abide somewhere, regardless. Even when you go to hell you are still immortal. He is really saying that you don't obtain immortality by accepting Jesus. You obtain immortality the moment you become a human being and, thus, obtain an immortal soul. He is trying to give more credit to Jesus than he is due, even under orthodox theology. According to the latter Jesus doesn't give you immortality; you have it whether you want it or not. It's not your choice to make. If you don't want it, then you should never have become a human being to start with.

Sixth, on page 207 Martin notes the conflict between Ex. 33:20 ("And the Lord said, Thou canst not see my face: for there shall no man see me and live") and Ex. 33:11 ("And the Lord spoke to Moses face to face") by saying,

"Ex. 33:11 (face to face) in the Hebrew is rendered 'intimate' and in no sense is it opposed to verse 20."

Martin is just wishing that were true. I have many versions of these verses and not one of them has anything approximating the word "intimate." Apparently Martin views his comprehension of Hebrew to be superior to that of those Hebraic translators who created the most well-known versions available.

In an additional attempt to refute the Mormon contention that God became flesh and blood in the OT, Martin attacks the Mormon's reliance upon Gen. 32:30 by alleging

"it is the angel of the Lord...not Jehovah Himself" who is speaking to Jacob. Unfortunately for Martin his argument is utterly without substance and exposes the lengths to which apologists will go to distort scripture for their own ends. The text clearly shows that Jacob wrestled with God, not an angel, and God was flesh and bone at the time. The most appropriate method by which to prove as much is to cite the relevant text. Gen. 32:24-30 says, "And Jacob was left alone; and a man wrestled with him unto the breaking of the day. When the man saw that he did not prevail against Jacob, he touched the hollow of his thigh; and Jacob's thigh was put out of joint as he wrestled with him. Then he said, 'Let me go, for the day is breaking,' But Jacob said, 'I will not let you go, unless you bless me.' And he said to him, 'What is your name?' And he said, 'Jacob.' Then he said, 'Your name shall no more be called Jacob, but Israel, for you have striven with God and with men, and have prevailed. Then Jacob asked him, 'Tell me, I pray, your name.' But he said, 'Why is it that you ask my name? And there he blessed him. So Jacob called the name of the place Peniel, saying, 'For I have seen God face to face, and yet my life is preserved.'

Well there you have it in all its radiant detail. Martin was wrong in several respects. First, it specifically states that Jacob wrestled with God. The man with whom Jacob wrestled said "you have striven with God." Nowhere does the text say Jacob wrestled with an angel. Second, Jacob was blessed by the man with whom he fought. God certainly blessed people in the OT but where was this function performed by angels? And third, Jacob directly states that he saw God "face to face." He did not say he saw an angel or wrestled with an angel. So, for the text to be clearer would be difficult.

As part of his summary of this debate Martin erroneously states,

"To argue, as the Mormons do, that such occurrences indicate that God has a body of flesh and bone, as Prophet Smith taught, is on the face of the matter untenable and another strenuous attempt to force polytheism on a rigidly monotheistic religion."

Actually there is virtually no stress involved and the position is quite tenable. In fact, Martin would have done better to have avoided this issue entirely.

On top of everything else, this discussion returns us to the Trinitarian dilemma. If God can not be flesh and bone as Martin contends, then how could Jesus be God, since he was clearly flesh and bone?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #701 from Ken Bonnell of Los Angeles, California

Dear Dennis. In issue #164 your response to letter #684, Part i, should be reconsidered. Your writer (I think Ken means me--Ed.) was wrong in asserting that "Defraud not" is not a commandment. There are, especially in Leviticus, many commandments that are outside of "The Ten Commandments." Specifically, look at chapter 17 of Leviticus, which begins, "And Yahweh spoke to Moses, saying, 'Speak to Aaron and to his sons and to all the children of Israel, and say to them: This is what Yahweh has commanded..." Then follow commandments pertaining to sacrifices, eating of blood, etc. on into chapter 19 where at verse 13 it says, "You shall not defraud your neighbor." It is therefore a commandment, statute, or ordinance, all words being synonymous, and lose their distinction by the command to obey the statutes and ordinances. If you use any of this letter, please use my name.

Editor's Response to Letter #701

Dear Ken. Three points.

First, we are talking about the Ten Commandments, not commandments in general. I fully realize that many instructions throughout the Pentateuch are referred to as commandments, but in Mark 10:19 and Matt. 19:18-19 Jesus lists the commands that were written on stone and are specifically referred to as the Ten Commandments in Ex. 34:28, Deut. 4:13, and Deut. 10:4. So we are only talking about THE Ten Commandments, not commandments in general.

Second, "Defraud not" was not in the list written on stone. So I was correct "in asserting that 'Defraud not' is not a commandment." At least it's not one of the Ten Commandments and that is all we and Jesus are discussing.

And finally, you say, "It is therefore a commandment, statute, or ordinance, all words being synonymous, and lose their distinction...." No, they are not synonymous. If that were true, then why does Gen. 26:5 say, "Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws"? Why the distinctions if they are all the same? Why does Deut. 4:40 say, "Thou shalt keep therefore his statutes, and his commandments, which I command thee this day.."? Why does Deut. 5:31 say, "I will speak unto thee all the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which thou shalt teach them...?" And why does Deut. 6:1 say, "Now these are the commandments, the statutes, and the judgments, which the Lord your God commanded to teach you..."? Why the distinctions? Why, because they are not synonymous. If they were, one word would be sufficient. Unfortunately the Bible is by no means clear as to how they are different. What is the difference between a commandment, an ordinance, a statute and a judgment? No clear answer is provided, although they are different.

Letter #702 from JS of Grosse Pointe Farms, Michigan

In reaction to your July 1996 issue of Biblical Errancy, let me say the following. The other day I was "surfing" the internet, and decided to do a search on the phrase "Biblical Errancy." The search resulted in three, and only three, hits. Numbers two and three were simply lists that a couple of public libraries chose to post on the internet, giving newly acquired titles--on which your book was included.

Number one, however, was the web site of some guy who claims to defend the accuracy of the Bible. I scanned quickly, and, although I did not bother to read it all, I was impressed with the quantity of material, and the number of suckers who have been dialoguing with the guy. Credit, by the way, was given to three guys for the web site--at least one of whom seems to be a theology student. I think something ought to be done about this. Whenever anyone punches in "Biblical Errancy," your web site should be the first one to pop up.

Editor's Response to Letter #702

Dear JS. I couldn't agree more but when I checked the cost for a web site my conclusion was that my pocketbook would be caught in a web. More importantly, I don't think I would have time to keep it current, even with sufficient funds. Still, I certainly con-cur with your sentiments and thanks for the concern.

Letter #703 from HB of Kettering, Ohio

Dennis. For those who are interested in entering into a dialogue or a debate with Christians or those who proselytize (try to convert) door to door I believe one of the most effective ways is to let them in (they usually come in pairs). Appear to be naive as this seems to make them feel you are vulnerable to their subject matter. Ask them if they will give you equal time to ask them questions. If they are willing, and if you have done your homework, your questions should be far superior to their answers.

The method I have found that works best is to use numbers that contradict each other and give chapter and verse. The same is true in the Old and New Testament such as in the following examples: 2 Sam. 6:23 (Michal had no child), 2 Sam. 21:8 (Michal had five sons); First Kings 7:26 (2,000 baths) vs. 2 Chron. 4:5 (3,000 baths); Matt. 1:16 (Joseph's father was Jacob) vs. Luke 3:23 (Joseph's father was Heli). Then we have Bible absurdities: Gen. 3:1 (a talking serpent), Num. 22:27-28 (a talking ass), Gen. 19:26 (Lot's wife becoming a pillar of salt), Psalms 22:21, 29:6, Num 23:22, and Deut. 33:17 (Unicorns).

(HB inserts my video tapes into his VCR and asks guests like Jehovah's Witnesses and Mormons to view them--Ed.). If you know you are weak in some areas you can use some video tapes produced by Dennis McKinsey on just about every part of the Bible that could assist you. I like tapes 1 and 2 on biblical contradictions. Before viewing a tape I request them to take a pen and write chapter and verse where they disagree. When I ask them questions, they usually say, "I don't know, I don't know" and head for the door or they become quiet. I believe the contention that "you will know the truth and it will set you free."

Letter #704 from Anonymous in Ohio

Dear Dennis. If I recall, the last conversation I had with you was over the phone. We talked a bit about the pro's and con's of your disarmingly placid demeanor during your radio debates of earlier years. We were at variance at bit, you feeling that you had "sounded like a wimp" and I feeling that humility and patient tenacity was more in evidence.

Editor's Response to Letter #704

Dear Anonymous. I remember our conversation well, especially the support you gave for my radio appearances years ago. Perhaps I was too harsh on myself. After all I was basically a novice at the time and was quite reticent in both demeanor and speech. When I listen to my tapes of ten and fifteen years ago the first thought that comes to my mind in several instances is: Why was I so timid; why did I sit back and take it; why didn't I come down harder and respond more forcefully? Rest assured that policy has been changed dramatically. Not long ago I was asked to reappear on a Buffalo station on which I was a guest in the mid-1980's. After my appearance concluded the host immediately said something to the effect: Man have you changed. You sure come on strong now, don't you. How right he was. Unfortunately he did not send me a recording of the second program as I requested. I wonder why? I let stuff pass unchallenged in years gone by that wouldn't get more than a toe through the door nowadays. I also submitted to some patronizing Christian sermons that would be blown out of the water if they were again to rear their condescending heads and juvenile judgments. I can especially remember meekly submitting to a harangue I received during a private meeting with 5 Church of Christ members around 1984. The head minister, who had his own call-in radio program, dressed me down as if he were pontificating to the wayward. As kids say on the playground, I'd like to see him try that again. I would welcome an opportunity to rectify that miscarriage of justice.

When I began this journey of blazing new trails years ago, I was understandably uncertain and reticent. That entire attitude of reluctance is now history and a new philosophy prevails.

Letter #705 from RP of Roseburg, Oregon (Part a)

I wholeheartedly agree with the sentiments in your Editor's Note of the Nov. 1996 issue. I finally got on the Internet a couple of months ago, and found it to be a treasure-trove of material on topics such as biblical errancy, atheism, creationism, and related topics. I usually spend half an hour down-loading files to my computer, and then spend the next day reading them and printing them out.

I was surprised, then, to be unable to find your e-mail address, either printed in BE or in any of the several internet directories I searched. I also read (I think it was in the Internet Infidels Newsletter) that you had declined an invitation to participate in the Secular Web site. If that report is correct, I hope you will reconsider, for the reasons that you stated in your Note.

In particular, I would love to see the back issues of BE on the Web. You often refer to them, and you cite them frequently in your Encyclopedia, but I am a fairly recent subscriber (I only learned about you last year) and I don't have those back issues. If I were wealthy I would order them all at a dollar apiece, but I'm not.

Editor's Response to Letter #705 (Part a)

Putting my literature on the Web sounds like an excellent idea to me. I hope those who can do so will proceed apace. They have my permission as long as people are apprised of the name and address of the source.

The overriding reason I originally declined an invitation to participate in the Internet of Infidels was that I had a real problem with belonging to a group calling itself "Infidels." Webster's Dictionary defines "infidelity" as unfaithfulness or disloyalty to another. I am neither. I am very loyal to reason, logic, science, and evidence. But even more importantly, "infidelity" implies I somehow stabbed someone in the back after I led them to trust me. That is the image Christians seek to portray of those who reject their theology and other superstitions. It is an ignominious term applied by religionists to their opponents and I saw no reason to corroborate accusations that are wholly inaccurate. However, I have since reconsidered and decided to join, despite this major reservation. As they say, you can't have everything

As far as our E-mail address is concerned it will henceforth appear correctly at the end of all issues.

By the way, let me thank you for The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy, which I recently bought. It is a treasure, and you are to be complimented and praised for the work you put into it.

I was touched by the letter from FN (#697) from the Texas penitentiary. May I suggest that you tell him about Farrell Till's offer of a year's free subscription to his newsletter, The Skeptical Review. Please also tell him that I would be happy to send him materials I may download from the Internet. You may give him my address. Thanks again for all your efforts.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #705 (Part b)

Thank you for your compliment regarding The Encyclopedia.

Rather than sending your address to the Texas inmate, I will send his address to you and you can take it from there. Although I have no reason to question the sincerity of the Texas inmate, I wouldn't feel comfortable mailing the addresses of people to those who are incarcerated.

We are more than happy to publicize Farrell Till's address and have occasionally done so, since Farrell and I are on the same page in so far as Scripture is concerned. In no sense do we consider Farrell a competitor. When he gets subscribers I am delighted.

Dear Dennis. Yes, I would really appreciate it if you could put my name, address, and phone number in your newsletter in hopes of finding someone here in Arizona who could help me with my computer and the Internet. I have the equipment, and I'm willing to pay the cost of the Internet hook up, and I can supply the Bible knowledge, but I need someone who knows the mechanics and can help me get the information out.

Editor's Response to Letter #706

Dear G. Noble. We are more than glad to be of assistance and hope that one of our fine subscribers can either assist you or recommend someone who can. Any of our supporters trying to counteract religion in general and the Bible in particular via the Net deserves whatever aid is feasible because we certainly need troops.

COMMENTARY

This month's issue will conclude our analysis of some biblical problems and mistakes found in apologist Walter Martin's book entitled The Kingdom of the Cults.

REVIEW

THE KINGDOM OF THE CULTS (Part 2): Seventh, on page 225 Martin tries to slip in a subtle twist on the Book of James in order to escape from the dilemma it presents to those who adhere to Paul's maxim that you are saved by faith alone. In his continuing battle with Mormon theology he states,

"The Scriptures disagree with the Mormons in their insistence upon good works as a means of salvation. The Book of James clearly teaches (chapter 2) that good works are the outgrowth of salvation and justify us before men, proving that we have the faith which justifies us before God (Romans 4 and 5)."

Martin often worked on the principle that if he talked authoritatively enough and sounded sufficiently resolute in his convictions that would carry the day. But unfortunately, all too often that tactic doesn't fill the bill. In this instance, for example, James 2 proves nothing of the sort. In fact, James specifically states that man is justified by works. While verses 2:14 ("What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works? Can faith save him?"), 2:17 ("Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone"), 2:20 ("...faith without works is dead"), and 2:26 ("For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also") say both faith and works are necessary for salvation, verses 2:21 ("Was not Abraham our father justified by works..."), 2:24 ("Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only"), and 2:25 ("Likewise also was not Rahab the harlot justified by works...") say works alone are sufficient. And that is diametrically opposed to Paul's reliance upon faith alone. Martin could not have picked a worse chapter to prove his point. He should have avoided James 2 as if it had the plague.

Eighth, on page 299 Martin attacked the Unity School of Christianity's employment of Matt. 11:14 to prove reincarnation. While talking about

John the Baptist, Jesus said in that verse ("And if ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come"). Jesus clearly referred to John the Baptist as the deceased Elias. In response Martin says,

"Jesus was here commenting on Malachi 4:5 and applying to John the Baptist the mantle of prophecy in the tradition of Elijah. Christ, in answering the Jews, merely gave the prophecy its true meaning. Neither the context nor the prophecy refers in any way to John being a reincarnation of Elijah...."

Martin's defense is little more than a variation on the old cliché: That's what it says but that's not what it means. The problem lies not with the fact that the verse is being interpreted too literally, but with Martin's inserting a construction that is alien to the text. Nowhere does the verse imply, much less state, that a "mantle of prophecy in the tradition of Elijah" is being bestowed on John the Baptist. That is a wholly gratuitous overlay. The fact is that Jesus said John the Baptist is Elias, not merely an inheritor of his mantle.

Ninth*, the weakest attack upon the cults mounted by Martin in his book lies in his assault upon the Adventist belief that the Sabbath, Saturday, is the true day of worship, not Sunday. Here, more than anywhere else, his arguments fall like duck pins in a bowling alley. On page 460 Martin states,

"We may certainly assume that if the Sabbath had meant so much to the writers of the NT; and if, as Adventists insist, it was so widely observed during the early centuries of the Christian Church, John and the other writers of Scripture would have equated it with the Lord's Day, the first day of the week. Scripture and history testify that they did not, and Adventists have, therefore, little Scriptural justification for their Sabbatarianism."

While magicians practice sleight of hand, Martin practices sleight of head. True, NT writers never equated the Lord's day with the Sabbath or the 7th day of the week, but what Martin artfully neglects to mention is that they never equated it with the first day of the week either. He tries to give his readers the impression that because the 7th day is never equated with the Lord's day, the 1st day becomes the Lord's day by default. Sorry! But that's not how it works. Martin says

"the Lord's Day, the first day of the week."

Where does the Bible ever state that the Lord's Day is the first day of the week, or the first day of the week is the Lord's Day? Martin slipped in this little tidbit, hoping his readers would not catch a wholly unsubstantiated assumption. The phrase "the Lord's Day" only appears once in all of Scripture.

To prove that Sunday is the Lord's Day, Martin relies upon extra biblical sources, especially church fathers, instead of Scripture, since the latter doesn't support his position. He states,

"The Church Fathers provide a mass of evidence that the first day of the week, not the seventh, is the Lord's Day."

Not only does he leave the Bible in order to make his case but, interesting enough, three of the ten sources he cites, don't even prove the very point he is trying to make. Where do any of the following citations specifically state that the Lord's Day is Sunday? He cites:

- Didache of the Apostles ("On the Lord's own day, gather yourselves together and break bread and give thanks"),
- Bardaisan, ("Wherever we be, all of us are called by the one name of the Messiah, namely Christians and upon one day which is the first day of the week we assemble ourselves together and on the appointed days we abstain from food"),
- and the Epistle of Pliny to the Emperor Trajan ("They [the Christians] affirmed...that the whole of their crime or error was that they had been wont to meet together on a fixed day before daylight and to repeat among themselves in turn a hymn to Christ as to a god and to bind themselves by an oath...; these things being duly done, it had been their custom to disperse and to meet again to take food--of an ordinary and harmless kind. Even this they had ceased to do after my edict, by which, in accordance with your instructions, I had forbidden the existence of societies").

Again, where do any of these sources say the Lord's Day is Sunday? Where are the two equated? Even Bardaisan's comment that they assembled on the first day of the week does not prove or state that's the Lord's Day.

Of the seven remaining citations, only one, just one, calls Sunday the Lord's Day. Cyprian (Bishop of Carthage) states, "The Lord's Day is both the first and the eighth day." All the rest, which includes Ignatius (Bishop of Antioch), Justin Martyr, The Epistle of Barnabas, Irenaeus (Bishop of Lyons), Eusebius, and Peter (Bishop of Alexandria), link the two only indirectly by referring to the Lord's Day as the day of the resurrection.

Martin concludes this section by saying on page 461,

"In their zeal to establish the authority of the Sabbath, Adventists either reject contrary evidence as unauthentic (and so conflict with the preponderance of scholastic opinion), or they ignore the testimony of the early church. Although they seem unaffected by the evidence, the fact remains that the Christian Church has both apostolic and historical support for observing the Lord's Day in place of the Sabbath."

How wrong can you be? Martin is accusing Adventists of practicing precisely the attitude that he so vividly exhibits. He rejects contrary evidence by completely ignoring the fact that Scripture nowhere justifies substituting the Lord's Day for the sabbath, Saturday, and he relies upon a "preponderance of scholastic opinion" as if that were sufficient to overrule the clear teachings of Scripture. Since when did the pronouncements of a body of extra-biblical individuals have precedence over Holy Writ?

He also says he has apostolic support for the belief that the Lord's Day should be observed in place of the Sabbath. Unfortunately he is never so kind as to cite his apostolic verses, and in the final analysis that is all that really matters to a true Christian. No doubt the lack of citations can be attributed to the fact that there are no verses to cite.

As further evidence of his confusion, Martin continues by saying,

"Recently the Adventist radio program Voice of Prophecy circulated a 31 page pamphlet entitled, Authoritative Quotations on the Sabbath and Sunday. In it they quoted 'leading' Protestant sources to 'prove' that Sunday usurped the Sabbath and is a pagan institution imposed by Constantine in 321.

However, many of the sources quoted actually establish what the Adventists flatly deny; i.e., that the seventh-day Sabbath is not the Lord's Day or the first day of the week, but is, in fact, the seventh day as its name indicates.

Since the Adventists are willing to quote these authorities to buttress their position in one area, surely they will give consideration to contradictory statements by these same authorities in another:

At this point Martin injudiciously decided to quote these Adventist authorities.

1. "The Lord's Day did not succeed in the place of the Sabbath.... The Lord's Day was merely an ecclesiastical institution.... The primitive Christians did all manner of work upon the Lord's Day" (Bishop Jeremy Taylor, Ductor Dubitantium); 2. "The observance of the Lord's Day [Sunday] is founded not on any command of God, but on the authority of the church" (Augsburg Confession of Faith, quoted in Catholic Sabbath Manual); 3. "But they err in teaching that Sunday has taken the place of the Old Testament Sabbath and therefore must be kept as the Seventh day had to be kept by the children of Israel" (J.T. Mueller, Sabbath or Sunday); 4. "They (the Catholics) allege the Sabbath changed into Sunday, the Lord's Day, contrary to the Decalogue as it appears, neither is there any example more boasted than the changing of the Sabbath Day" (Martin Luther, Augsburg Confession of Faith); 5. "Although it (Sunday) was in primitive times and differently called the Lord's day or Sunday, yet it was never denominated the Sabbath; a name constantly appropriate to Saturday, or the Seventh day both by sacred and ecclesiastical writers" (Charles Buck, A Theological Dictionary); And 6. "The notion of a formal substitution by apostolic authority of the Lord's Day (meaning Sunday) for the Jewish Sabbath (or the first for the seventh day)... the transference to it perhaps in a spiritualized form of the Sabbath obligation established by promulgation of the fourth commandment has no basis whatever, either in Holy Scripture or in Christian antiquity" (Sir William Smith and Samuel Cheetham, A Dictionary of Christian Antiquities).

Thus the Adventists have in effect destroyed their argument by appealing to authorities which state unequivocally that the first day of the week is the Lord's Day and that it was observed by the early Christian Church from the time of the Apostles."

After having read these quotations, one can only conclude that Martin got lost in the shuffle somewhere, or is hoping his readers will be. He quoted sources that, in effect, are proving the Adventist position instead of his own. He failed to carefully note the wording of the fourth commandment ("Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days you shall labor, and do all your work; but the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God...."). In other words, the sabbath is to be honored not the Lord's Day, whenever that may be. The Fourth Commandment directs mankind to observe the sabbath, and nothing whatever is said regarding paying homage to the Lord's Day. He helped discredit his own argument. The sources he cites actually say the Lord's day did not replace the sabbath, and observance of the Lord's day is not based on scripture but on church teachings.

After ill-advisedly quoting these authorities Martin concludes,

"Thus the Adventists have in effect destroyed their argument by appealing to authorities which state unequivocally that the first day of the week is the Lord's Day and that it was observed by the early Christian Church from the time of the Apostles."

The Adventists did not destroy anything of the sort, because their concern is with honoring the Sabbath, not the Lord's day. After all, isn't the Sabbath the day to be honored? Where do the Ten Commandments say "Honor the Lord's day and keep it holy"? What difference does it make if several authorities allege that the first day of the week is the Lord's day? That's not the day that matters. That's not the issue. And what difference does it make if the early Christian Church was observing the Lord's day from the time of the apostles? All that would prove is that members of the early Church were ignoring a clear mandate of Scripture. Honoring the Lord's day, even if it could be proven that Sunday was the Lord's day, was not one of the original commandments.

Martin has done everything he can think of to shift the focus from concentration on the word "sabbath" to concentration on the phrase "the Lord's day" because everyone knows the former can only be the seventh day or Saturday. By trying to shift the attention of everyone to "the Lord's day" and somehow link that with Sunday, he hopes to be able to justify the systematic violation of the fourth commandment by nearly all of Christendom.

Martin concludes his steady descent into quicksand by saying, "It should also be carefully noted that in their 'Authoritative Quotations' the Adventists overlook the fact that nearly all the authorities argue forcefully for the Lord's Day as the first day of the week, and state that legal observance of the Sabbath terminated at the cross (Col. 2:16-17)." Which day of the week is the Lord's day is of no consequence, since there is no obligation to honor the Lord's Day in the Ten Commandments. It's the sabbath that matters. But even more importantly, Martin says that "legal observance of the Sabbath terminated at the cross." Oh really! Then what are Christians doing to honor the Fourth Commandment, may I ask? After all, it says Honor the sabbath and keep it holy. Nowhere does it say honor the Lord's Day.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #707 from DM of Supply, North Carolina

Dear Dennis.

I spoke with you about the passage in Matt. 12:40 ("For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly; so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth") and you suggested I write to you about it and here goes.

The difficulty caused by Matthew 12:40 when compared to other passages in the Bible was the first one that initially caused me to lose confidence in the inerrancy of the Bible. I was a born-again Christian, totally sold on the infallibility and inerrancy of the "Word of God". I spent ten years (1974-84) attending services with the Worldwide Church of God, voraciously reading the "Plain Truth", and the "Good News" magazines, studying the Ambassador College Home Bible Study Course and hundreds of other "booklets" and "reprint articles" that claimed to impart the plain truth to the spiritually hungry. I really believed that I was being "called" by God to understand his truths. From 1974 to 1988 I did not consider myself "born again". The WCG taught at that time that no one is "born again" until the return of Christ. However, I left the WCG in 1984 (for personal reasons) and four years later I did the unthinkable. I joined a Sunday keeping church in Atlanta! It was the First Baptist Church, pastored by Charles Stanley. Such a move was not made lightly, and despite being four years removed from WCG indoctrination, I still had difficulty making the change. I never totally embraced all the doctrines that the rest of the members of FBA held, but rather I held a combination of some of the beliefs I had held in the WCG and some of the beliefs held by the majority of members at FBA. I even refused to call myself a baptist but rather called myself a "Christian who worships in a baptist church." I was already a freethinker in the making because I determined that a church would never again dictate for me what was true and what was false without my full informed consent. It is true that my "full informed consent" was insufficient at the time because my idea of full and informed consent was reading apologetic works from different denominations that believed in the inerrancy of the Bible. In other words, I wanted to know what different denominations taught so I could be better qualified to select what was true and what wasn't, but I limited myself to those who believed in the inerrancy of the scriptures. To me, inerrancy couldn't even be debated, so I never thought about reviewing my beliefs on inerrancy, just the different doctrines that denominations disagreed upon.

This criteria didn't last long. When you have spent 10 years of your life in a church believing with all your heart and soul you have the truth and no one else has it, and you are so convinced you have the truth you would even die for it, but later find some of your doctrinal beliefs were in error, it makes it difficult to totally sell out the second time. Yes, I was in a baptist church, but I never sold my soul to them. I began an investigation on Christian doctrines and determined that the FBA would be my home church until I found something better. I knew then I had been wrong before, terribly wrong, and I didn't want to be wrong again. I could testify how fervently one could believe something, and be absolutely sure of it and later discover it to be false. I would sometimes lie in bed at night and talk to God, imploring him to help me to KNOW the truth. I could see that intelligent people at FBA believed the doctrines they held, so how could they be wrong? But then I remembered that the WCG had their intelligent people too, and they held just as fervently to their beliefs. I didn't imagine myself as intelligent as some of them, so I wondered how could I ever be certain again. I was sure that the intelligent ones prayed just as fervently as I for the truth and yet they arrived at different conclusions from each other. It was becoming obvious to me that intelligence wasn't enough. A person had to totally empty himself of any prior beliefs and start over, even if he had to begin with the basic question of: Is the Christian Bible the word of God? Of course no matter how hard I tried to be impartial, I still was aware that I was prejudiced in my belief that the Bible was the word of God. I had to MAKE AN EFFORT TO BE FAIR.

It was during the summer of 1988 that things really began to change. I first noticed a discrepancy between Matt. 12:40 and the other passages describing the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus. I also noticed the conflicting genealogies in Matthew and Luke. I read the apologetic works for answers and they all failed to provide satisfying answers. My Christian friends told me to just "trust God", but that didn't help resolve the issue. Once one begins to entertain the very real possibility of mistakes in the Bible, then all kinds of thoughts begin to occur. The implications for a fundy like myself are huge. My whole world view was threatened. But I'm getting off the subject. My change from fundy to liberal Christian to outright infidel took a little over 12 months, from the summer of 1988 to early fall 1989. Once a crack in the dam occurs, it is only a matter of time before the whole thing collapses. Two difficult passages that couldn't be reconciled became outright contradictions, but the implications of Matt. 12:40 being a contradiction did more to damage the trustworthiness of the Bible than the genealogies did. Too much was riding on Matthew 12:40 for it to prove to be a contradiction. Once my internal bias for the Bible had been damaged, I began to notice more "difficulties" and "discrepancies" that in time I had to admit were contradictions or absurdities. The trickle became a stream, the stream became a flood. You can figure the rest. I left FBA in the fall of 1989 and ceased being a "member" at that time. I called myself a deist when I left and used deist interchangeably with atheist from fall 1989 to fall 1991, at which time I began to have contacts with the writings of freethinkers like myself, and was able to accept the label "atheist" without worry.

In December 1992 I came into contact with the Truth Seeker magazine and through them I was able to contact you, Farrell Till, the Freedom From Religion Foundation and others. It is always a joy to read of others who have had similar experiences like myself. Thanks for your publication.

Letter #708 from RN of Moscow, Idaho

Dear Dennis.

I enclose a check for $20 for which please send me a couple of your videos.... We hope to show them on the public access channel on the local TV cable.

Moving to another topic, (What follows is my analysis of "THE HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS"--Ed.)

Most Christian bookstores sell what are known as "harmonies of the gospels." These books purport to put the contents of the four gospels into one continuous account. This is supposed to serve two purposes: one, to be a sort of "reader's digest" of the gospels for people who have little time to read; two, to smooth out, or "harmonize," the contradictions among the gospels.

Although several dozen of these harmonies are currently available, new ones continue to be written in the hope that someone will finally determine what "really" happened in the gospel stories. But this is a vain hope, because back in the middle of the second century A.D. the gospels already contradicted each other. And if they were not the original manuscripts, they were certainly very early copies of them.

So about the year 160 a Christian writer called Tatian compiled the very first "harmony of the gospels." He picked out the events and sayings that appealed to him and left out the rest. But other Christians did not agree with his choices, so they have been playing the same, old, no-win game of "harmonizing the gospels" ever since. The gospels cannot be harmonized because they have contradicted each other from the very beginning.

(What follows is my analysis entitled LIES ABOUT THE BIBLE--Ed.)

LIE: The Bible is without error or contradiction.

FACT: The Bible is filled with errors and contradictions from cover to cover.

LIE: The Bible consists of exactly 66 books.

FACT: The Jewish Bible has 39 books; the Catholic Bible 72; some Protestant Bibles 66. The 1611 KJV has 72 books in it.

LIE: The Bible is the "Word of God."

FACT: Nowhere does the Bible make such a claim.

LIE: The OT contains many prophecies about Jesus of Nazareth.

FACT: There is not a single reference to Jesus in the OT.

LIE: The OT teaches that there is life after death.

FACT: In the entire OT no one dies and goes to heaven. And there is no hell in the OT religion. Death is the end. (Except in Daniel, ca. 167 B.C., the latest book in the OT)

Beware of evangelists who lie about the Bible. They are wolves in sheep's clothing. They just want your mind and your money.

Letter #709 from JS of Grosse Pointe Farms, Michigan

Dear Dennis.

Here's a couple of bucks for that prisoner guy in Texas (Letter #697; Issue #167). Take this and add it to all the other money that will surely pour in from all freethinking Biblical Errancy readers, and give him a decent subscription to your august journal.

I stand by my statement referred to in Letter #693 part j; same issue: Not only is DA obviously a nut, but you have begun to attack people's motivations, something I never saw in the first three years of Biblical Errancy. As I said previously, this is a positive development. Of course, this necessarily implies that Biblical Errancy is up against not mere ignorance but psychological problems. And if this be true, then I wonder about the ancient cliché: If you stand on the street corner arguing with a fool for too long, people will soon wonder who is the fool!

If you don't question the motivation of people like DA, then you are either a fool or extremely naive. DA is like the typical Unitarian: he believes what he wants to believe, then expends enormous amounts of energy justifying his beliefs.

One last thing: when you say things like "relevant back issue" or "years ago," can you cite chapter and verse? People need to know where to look in the back issues of Biblical Errancy for the information you are referring them to. Five years ago I knew where to find anything in Biblical Errancy merely from memory; that is no longer the case.

Editor's Response to Letter #709

Dear JS.

A concerned subscriber has been kind enough to purchase a subscription for the inmate in Texas, and some back issues have been sent to him courtesy of another generous donor. I trust he will put his copies to good use in his ongoing struggle with his religious environment, since they can't very well be used for much else in view of his current status.

Insofar as the analogy you draw between arguing with DA and standing on a corner arguing with a fool is concerned, that has come to my mind in fleeting moments as well. No doubt many people would agree with your assessment of DA, including Unitarians, but I don't think the latter are going to be very happy with your comparison between them and DA.

Lastly, if you force me to give the actual cite every time I refer to what I said in past issues of BE, then I might have to delete some of what I intend to say. I, like you, long ago forgot what I have in each issue and made no attempt to memorize them. I don't have time to create the kind of index that is needed for this type of retrieval. The technical aspects of BE are a concern that I have largely left to others over the years. All I can do at this stage of the game is make my references and hope others will believe me or look them up. The first couple of years I had every issue memorized, but that kind of comprehension has long since gone by the boards.

Letter #710 from FDN of Huntsville, Texas

(FDN is a Texas inmate who wrote to us earlier, and in doing so prompted one subscriber to buy him a subscription to BE and another to buy him the first 20 issues of BE--Ed.)

Dear Dennis.

I got the fabulous package of back issues and news of another year's subscription to your great polemics. I attribute much of my clear understanding and continued advancement in learning "how to think" to Biblical Errancy. Your intensity to reason fulfills a daily desire I have to stimulate the "critical thinking" part of who "I am." And when I say "thank you" over and over it takes on a hollowness I try to avoid. During this one life, acts of thoughtfulness and the greatest act of all, kindness, such as you and two of your other subscribers have shown, simple as it may seem to some, deserves more than a thank you. However, I am limited by our language and my situation. So, would you please accept and convey a deep sense of appreciation that a mere thank you could not accomplish.

Also please feel free to publish my address, which is P.O. Box 32 248997, Huntsville, Texas 77348. I enjoy discussing any topic, both with freethinkers or religious individuals.

Editor's Response to Letter #710

Dear FDN.

I have no doubt you kind sentiments are appreciated, not only by me but by your benefactors as well. Incidentally, you have inadvertently hit upon a key element of this whole enterprise, a factor that is often overlooked. After having engaged in biblical dialogue and debate for more years than I originally planned, I have come to the conclusion that many biblicists defend religion in general and the bible in particular because they are simply unable to think critically, logically, objectively, or accurately. They have real problems marshaling the critical thinking that is so inseparable from good reasoning. That can primarily be attributed to the fact that some basic premises incompatible with logical thought were inculcated during their vulnerable formative years of youth. They have serious difficulty thinking rationally when confronted with facts that do not meld with what they have been taught, especially in regard to religion and the Bible. To put it simply, they just can't think straight when certain topics appear on their radar screen. The power of their wish almost invariably exceeds the strength of facts. They just can't see non sequiturs, unsubstantiated conclusions, superstitions, and anemic arguments. And they can't seem to separate that which is trivial from that which is significant.

Letter #711 from TS of Prescott Valley, Arizona

Dear Dennis.

Just a note to inform you that the Prescott Community Access Channel 13 is constantly having problems with your B.E. video tapes and usually ends up showing only a portion of your program.

This frequently occurs also whenever the Atheist Forum is shown. I called Channel 13 complaining about this, and I'm always given an apologetic excuse about the computer "shifting the tape."

This never happens during religious programs, so I can't help but wonder if the real problem lies with adults who are thinking like children (superstitious), also acting like children. Keep up the good work!!

Editor's Response to Letter #711

You are beginning to get a feel for what I have been encountering for years. Having been in this business for a long time and encountered numerous roadblocks, there is no doubt in my mind that official and unofficial censorship is the real problem in far too many instances. I never cease to be amazed at the number of people who spout free speech platitudes without surcease until their own basic beliefs are under serious assault.

EDITOR'S NOTE:* (a) We are still seeking volunteers willing to play our video programs on their local access channels. In my earliest shows I am somewhat ill at ease as you can probably tell, but I settle down as time goes by. Frankly I was concerned about how they would be received.

(b) We are still publishing the names and addresses of those wanting to be contacted by people living nearby. If you wish others to contact you, just send us your name and address for inclusion in a future issue.

Issue #171 Editor: Dennis McKinsey

Mar. 1997

A national periodical focusing on Biblical errors, contradictions, and fallacies, while providing a hearing for apologists

COMMENTARY

This month's issue will begin an analysis of the apologetic work entitled The Bible Has the Answer by apologists Morris and Clark.

REVIEW

THE BIBLE HAS THE ANSWER (Part 1)--Nearly two decades ago one of the leaders of the Institute of Creation Research, Henry Morris, and a companion, Martin Clark, wrote a book in which are contained the answers to over 100 questions regarding the validity of the Bible. Although Morris has a distinct interest in "science" as he views it, the range of questions contained within the work is considerably broader. The work has occasionally been quoted in BE, but a thorough critique of that which has not been addressed is long overdue. Although Morris and Clark apparently view themselves as capable defenders of the Bible, a rather substantial body of evidence exists to the contrary. The most appropriate means by which to prove as much is to unveil the sizable number of fallacies found within their apologetic work.

First, they are asked on the very first page, "How do you know the Bible is true?" They begin by saying they know the book is valid because of the large number of accurate prophecies contained therein, a defense which we debunked long ago. Then they say, "Another striking evidence of divine inspiration is found in the fact that many of the principles of modern science were recorded as facts of nature in the Bible long before scientists confirmed them experimentally." Some of those listed are: the roundness of the earth (Isa. 40:22), the almost infinite ex-tent of the sidereal [of or pertaining to the stars--Ed.] universe (Isa. 55:9), the vast number of stars (Jer. 33:22), the equivalence of matter and energy (Heb. 1:3), the law of increasing entropy (the disorder or randomness of a system tends to increase--Ed.) (Psa. 102:25-27), the paramount importance of blood in life processes (Lev. 17:11), the atmospheric circulation (Eccle. 1:6), the gravitational field (Job 26:7), and many others."

In true apologetic style Morris and Clark chose to interpret some verses as they desired, ignored those which are contradictory, and dwelled on those which are quite obvious to even a child. With these considerations in mind, let's address their examples.

(a) Isa. 40:22 ("It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth") may imply the earth is round but our illustrious scholars ignore the fact that Isaiah also said earlier in 11:12, "he...shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth." If the world is round or a globe, how can it have corners? If one is to be interpreted literally why isn't the other?

They also conveniently ignore the misstatement found in Matt. 4:8 which says, "Again, the devil taketh Jesus up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world." How could any-one see the entire world from the top of a mountain, no matter how high it may be?

(b) Isa. 55:9 ("For as the heavens are higher than the earth....") doesn't say anything substantive about the extent of the universe. It merely says one is higher than the other. If I say the roof in my house is higher than my floor, that is hardly equivalent to alleging "the almost infinite extent of the sidereal universe." One can say without fear of exaggeration that that is stretching things a bit.

(c) Jer. 33:22 ("As the host of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the sea measured...") is rather obvious to anyone who takes time to go out on a clear night and stare into the sky. Not much illumination is required for that observation.

(d) To say that Heb. 1:3 ("Who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high") proves the equivalence of matter and energy is little short of incomprehensible. The verse is both irrelevant and immaterial.

(e) Psa. 102:25-27 ("Of old thou didst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They will perish, but thou dost endure. Thou changest them like raiment, and they pass away; but thou are the same, and thy years have no end.") doesn't prove anything definite in regard to entropy because the latter is more in the nature of a process than an event, while these verses could easily entail a sudden alteration. When you change your clothes or raiment that could be considered a sudden occurrence as could be the process by which the earth and the heavens perish scripturally. The verses are just too indefinite, too vague, to definitely allege they are asserting entropy in some manner.

(f) Lev. 17:11 ("For the life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul") is not particularly informative or insightful either because the results of someone bleeding without surcease are obvious to all. Simple medical data assures us blood is needed for life.

Secondly, Morris and Clark slipped in the word "processes" earlier in order to make it sound as if Leviticus was ahead of its time and making reference to the circulatory system. The verse says blood is necessary for life, but nowhere does it say blood circulates throughout the body and contributes to "life processes" such as breathing, feeling, and thinking.

And thirdly, the entire verse has been twisted in such a manner as to serve apologetic motives. Leviticus is contending that the loss of blood atones for sins and by being shed it provides life to the soul. In that ethereal and secondary sense it is providing life for the flesh. Leviticus is referring to a kind of spiritual life giving, not the kind of life provided via blood flowing from the heart to the kidneys to the liver to the intestines, etc.

(g) Eccle. 1:6 ("The wind blows to the south, and goes around to the north; round and round goes the wind and on its circuits the wind returns") is another one of those verses that is nowhere near as perceptive as Morris and Clark would have us believe. Any reasonably intelligent child knows that atmospheric winds blow in different directions and return.

(h) And lastly, it is also mentally taxing to determine how Job 26:7 ("He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing") proves the Bible taught the existence of a gravitational field. It would be considerably easier to prove a field of gravitation exists by simply pushing something off a table.

The lengths to which the imaginations of apologists will go to assist their belief in biblical prescience with reference to science are truly something to behold. As with messianic prophecy, they have scoured scripture with a fine tooth comb and gleaned every verse or group of connected verses that could possibly be warped in such a manner as to serve their ends.

Second, Morris and Clark address the following question on page 4: In what sense and to what extent is the Bible the Inspired Word of God? As part of their answer they say, "Those modern-day preachers and professors of religion who seem to take delight in finding supposed mistakes in the Bible thus in effect are calling God a liar!" This comment would only have validity if the Bible were in fact the word of the divine being in whom religionists place so much faith. Until they prove as much, which can't be done because of a veritable ocean of evidence to the contrary, this comment remains pure nonsense. Morris and Clark are following in the footsteps of many apologetic predecessors by assuming the very point in dispute. They assume the Bible is the word of a supreme being and proceed from there, when more than enough evidence is available to destroy their premise. If anyone is being called a liar, its those who compiled the book to start with.

Third, on page 7 they say, "Science has never disproved any statement of the Bible--rather, most scientists have simply repudiated it because of their unwillingness to submit to God's authority as Creator and coming Judge."

(a) This is typical of the bogus rationale so often employed by apologists. They seek to blame the messenger rather than reality creating the message. To begin with, as we have so often said, scientists are not required to disprove anything. He who alleges must prove. When the Bible says people rose from the dead or a stick turned into a serpent or a woman turned into a pillar of salt or a donkey talked or a woman was made from a man's rib or the sun stood still, it is obligated to prove as much. And until the requisite proof is forthcoming, these contentions remain, what they have always been, figments of people's imaginations.

(b) The unwillingness of scientists to accept mere testimony and words in a book as proof is not evidence of a superego and an unwillingness to accept the authority of a higher entity on the part of scientists. It is proof that scientists are rational, logical beings making nothing more than a simple request for something more substantial than somebody's attestation. Is that too much to ask? Of course not.

At the bottom of page 8 they say, "Not one statement has ever been disproved by any real facts of science or history." Utterly false! A far more accurate way to state this would be "Many biblical statements have not been proven by any facts of science or history." As long as the burden of proof is kept on the shoulders of those with whom it justifiably remains, the religionists are going to remain dead in their "tracts."

Fourth, at the bottom of page 10 they make another grandiose assertion by saying, "The Bible is a marvelous unity in all its diversity.... Every part throws light on every other part...." If there is anything the Bible does not display it is "unity in all its diversity," let alone "marvelous unity." It would be far more accurate to say that nearly every part throws exposure, rather than "light," on every other part.

Fifth, while discussing on page 12 whether or not the King James Version should be abandoned in light of all the modern versions, they finally offer a credible generalization by saying, "After all, why should one commit to memory a particular verse of Scripture if even the authorities don't agree on what the verse says?"

Unfortunately they quickly follow this up with a comment that can only lead one to believe that they have not read very many versions on the market today. They state, "Furthermore, the English of the King James is not nearly so archaic or difficult to follow as its critics allege. In fact, it is in general written in a much simpler vocabulary, with a higher percentage of one- and two-syllable words than almost any of the modern translations. The honest reader will find it at least as easy to understand as any other." Since this statement deviates dramatically from reality, one can't help but wonder what modern versions they have in mind and how many they have read. How one can say the Revised Standard Version or the Good News Bible, for example, are not clearer and easier to read than the King James is anyone's guess.

Sixth, while trying to answer the question of how they can be sure God exists, they state on page 14 that, "Many people today would like to escape the authority of God and therefore have tried to convince themselves and others that science has done away with God and creation. Men would like to believe that they are accountable only to themselves...." As usual the fundamental premise upon which their "logic" rests is fatally flawed. Rather than acknowledging the obvious intelligence and logic inherent in the question--How do you know a God exists and what is your evidence--they choose to cast aspersions on the inquirer's motives. They don't confront the question; they attack the intentions of those posing the inquiry. Even if it were asked by someone with the worst of motives, it remains no less valid, logical, and sensible.

More often than not the question is solicited by those with perfectly understandable and proper concerns and doubts. After all, when people contend a god must exist because of what is said in a book that also tells you people rise from the dead, sticks turn into serpents, people walk on water and donkey's talk, one can certainly understand their reluctance to believe other claims that are equally bizarre and deficient in evidence.

Seventh, although this publication is not normally concerned with the existence of a god, we can't help but note some other comments by Morris and Clark that just can not be allowed to slip past the guards. On page 14 they state, "Yet the evidence for God is so clear and certain.... The very essence of the scientific method, in common with all human experience, involves the basic principle of Cause and Effect. That is, no effect can be greater than its causes. 'From nothing, nothing comes!' There must therefore be a First Cause of all things which has at least all the characteristics which are seen in the universe which has been produced by it." In so far as I am aware, the Law of Cause and Effect simply states that for every effect there must be a cause. But how does this prove there must be a first cause? Why must there be a first cause? And if everything must have a cause, then why doesn't that apply to God as well? They are relying upon what is commonly known as a non sequitur.

Morris and Clark state, "The First Cause must have intelligence, because there are intelligent beings in the universe...." This argument is about as sensible as saying the First Cause must be a car because there are cars in the universe. Why can intelligence only come from intelligence? The physical entity from which human intelligence emanates could easily have evolved over an incredible number of years into the complex organism it is today, the human brain.

They also state, "Similarly the First Cause must have emotional attributes since such things as emotions are surely present in the world. The highest and noblest emotion, most men would agree, is that of love, and thus the Cause of love must itself be One who possesses love in a very high degree." This is another poorly thought out conclusion. Love is only one of many emotions that exist in the world. If the First Cause must possess Love because love is the highest and noblest emotion on the positive side, then this First Cause must also possess hate, because hate is the highest emotion on the negative side and is equally powerful. Why must this First Cause only have positive as opposed to negative traits? Morris and Clark even stated earlier that the First Cause must have "at least all the characteristics which are seen in the universe which has been produced by it" and that would include the 7 deadly sins. Moreover, if the First Cause must possess Love because love is present in the world, then the car analogy comes into play again.

Eighth, and finally they say in regard to this First Cause concept, "The Second Law of Thermodynamics is that of Increasing Disorder, and it says that the universe is running down and wearing out. All processes tend toward a state of decay and ultimate death. Eventually, if present processes continue, the universe will die. And, since it has not yet died, it cannot be infinitely old and must have had a beginning at some time in the past." Morris and Clark are masters of the non sequitur. They constantly draw conclusions that do not logically follow from their premises. What does the eventual death or nondedeth of the universe have to do with how it was created or not created? Even if we assumed it were going to die, why couldn't it still have never had a beginning? Their book is a veritable cornucopia of barren conclusions resting upon fanciful foundations.

And while we are on the subject, no religionist has ever rationally explained to me why God, who is not known to exist, does not have to have a cause, while matter, which is known to exist, requires a creator. If God's existence can have an infinite retrogression, why can't that apply to the existence of matter as well? Why does matter have to have a creator while God doesn't? Why couldn't it always have been?

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #712 from MJ of Andover, Mass. (Part a)

(The following letter is from MJ who spends a lot of time discussing and debating religion and the bible with biblicists and distributing audio recordings of the encounters. He meets them in all sorts of locations and dialogue flows. He wrote us the following letter entitled "Why I Am Not a Liberal Christian"--Ed.)

Dear Dennis. I think your viewpoint is that if one wants to refute Christianity, you need to refute conservative Christianity, because that is essentially what Christianity is. My viewpoint is that since the majority of Christians are actually LIBERAL Christians, it is equally important to try to refute liberal Christianity, even though that job is akin to nailing jello to the wall.

At any rate, here is my effort to do so. You may want to take a section or two to comment upon in BE.

Let's say a man, such as myself, has been taught from a young age that the Bible is God's Word. And that this man, as an honest seeker of Truth, is determined to find out if this received wisdom, is really true.

He studies the Bible, listens to every teacher, respects every viewpoint, broods over every issue.

He wants to believe. But some passages make no sense. Some of the teachings miss the mark. Some of the theology is irrational. And some of God's behavior is very questionable. After many years, he knows that he can no longer in good conscience commit to Christianity.

He re-reads the Bible, only this time not through the lens of faith, but with a critical eye; and he finds that the book contradicts science and itself; its ethics are immoral; it is filled with God-directed cruelty and barbarism; its prophecies are not only unimpressive but demonstrably phony, and the problem of evil is not dealt with adequately.

He concludes that the Bible cannot be God's Word, and that orthodox Christianity is false. But because he has always seen the Jesus story as a powerful revelation of wisdom and love, he looks--with all his heart, soul, and will--for a way of understanding the Bible so that its central underlying message is still valid, still viable.

He becomes a liberal Christian. He adopts more sophisticated ways of interpreting. He no longer sees the Bible as God's directly inspired Word, but as man's flawed interpretation of his relationship with God, which interpretation, nonetheless, contains inspired messages, particularly in the person of Jesus.

He no longer sees Jesus as literally God on earth, omniscient, a miracle-worker, a perfect human being. Instead, Jesus is quite human, vulnerable, and flawed. Yet he is still the Son of God, in the sense that he best represented what God wants. He correctly presented God's essential message--that God cares about us, that everyone has worth, that man should love his neighbor. By his exemplary life, Jesus affirmed the fatherhood of God, and the brotherhood of man.

At the same time, his wisdom was not infallible. He was actually wrong in some of his beliefs - like expecting the world to end in his generation, or thinking that demons caused illness.

And some of his teachings may have been overstated by the writers. Did Jesus really say that he, rather than his message is "the only way"? That seems oddly ego-centric for one thing, and fundamentally unfair for another. To say he is the only way, is to exclude all those who have never heard of him, as well as all sincere and decent followers of other religions. A fair God would not condemn such people.

Clearly, what writers say Jesus said, is not necessarily what he did say. Possibly he was both wiser and more careful in his actual statements than what he is reported to have said.

Such overstated passages, as well as folkloric miracle stories, and contradictory narratives, and muddled advice, and irrational theology, could all be the product of flawed writers; yet Jesus could still be the primary source of divine wisdom in human history. The seeker continually looks for the kernel of truth behind the alleged words of Jesus.

He discounts much of John's later, longer, and theologically developed gospel, and tends to look at Mark's earlier, shorter, and more straightforward gospel as the most reliable.

But...even here, he finds disturbing and wrong-headed ideas, which, in the final analysis, he cannot put under the category of things Jesus didn't really say. Because if he did, the Biblical Jesus would be gutted; and all that would be left is a white-washed Hollywood movie version of Jesus.

It seems the only way to salvage an acceptable Jesus is indeed to ignore the Biblical Jesus, and go with the white-washed, idealized version, the version that most people in fact harbor.

But that would not be an honest endeavor - making up your own Jesus. The actual, the historical, the Biblical Jesus, is the Jesus we must deal with.

Once again throwing away all preconceptions, reexamining hundreds of issues, reviewing the entire mass of evidence, our seeker is finally forced to concede that Jesus, despite some revolutionary insights and remarkable courage and conviction, is really...a misguided religious fanatic.

He recognizes this conclusion is at odds with common wisdom. But he sees how Christians, both conservative and liberal, are culturally biased. They are indoctrinated to instinctively give Jesus a positive spin. Every average teaching is a pearl of wisdom, every non-sense saying is somehow an arresting insight. Jesus's faults, fanaticism, and questionable teachings are consistently overlooked.

But this popular conception of Jesus, this idealized version, is not the real Jesus. The real Jesus is the Biblical Jesus. And the Biblical Jesus....

(Stay Tuned. Next month MJ will describe the real biblical Jesus--Ed.)

Editor's Response to Letter #712 (Part a)

Dear MJ. I empathize with the general tenor of your commentary, but by failing to challenge liberal rationalizations at key intersections you appear to be inadvertently promoting liberal Christianity more than criticizing it. You are trying to walk a fine line and in doing so a few comments and omissions pushed you onto the wrong side of the fence.

First, you say "He becomes a liberal Christian. He adopts more sophisticated ways of interpreting." They aren't so much more "sophisticated" as they are unscrupulous. They jettison the clear meaning of the text for an interpretation that is more to their liking psychologically. The fact that their alteration is biblically unsustainable is of less importance to them than emotional contentment.

Second, you say, "He correctly presented God's essential message--that God cares about us, that everyone has worth, that man should love his neighbor." I don't understand why you believe this is God's central message. Are you getting this from the Bible? If so, how do you square that with the fact that God chose the Jews over all others to be his chosen people and allowed babes, infants, and other innocents to be slaughtered? Or maybe you are getting this from the world at large around us? If so, then how can you explain the incredible number of infants, babies, and other innocents who die throughout the world every day because of starvation, malnutrition, disease, neglect, and abandonment? This world reeks with pain and injustice.

Third, you say, "By his exemplary life, Jesus affirmed the fatherhood of God, and the brotherhood of man." As you probably remember, we proved in a series of commentaries that the life of Jesus was far from exemplary in many ways. Instead of providing rectification you defaulted credit to Jesus he never earned.

Fourth, you say, "he has always seen the Jesus story as a powerful revelation of wisdom and love." You should make it unmistakably clear that this is the viewpoint of liberals and not yourself, because the message of Jesus is far from wise and loving in too many instances. Indeed, at this point you would have done well to have provided some examples to the contrary.

Fifth, you say, "Did Jesus really say that he, rather than his message is 'the only way'? That seems oddly ego-centric for one thing, and fundamentally unfair for another." True, but that is what he said in John 14:6 and elsewhere, whether it is ego-centric and unfair or not. You say "a fair god would not condemn people" who have not heard of him or people in other religions. But, again, looking at the world today what leads you to believe this alleged God even exists or is fair if he does? I see virtually no evidence of divine justice or concern ruling the roost. Indeed, the world is absolutely inundated with inequities in practically every aspect and location imaginable. It is truly staggering. In any event, I look forward to your description of Jesus as I know from past experience it will be well considered.

Sixth, you say the Bible contains inspired messages according to the liberal. I would have quickly followed that up with a comment along the lines of what Robert Ingersoll said on page 233 of Vol. 11 of his Works. "...if the Bible is true, it needs no inspiration, and...if not true, inspiration can do it no good."

Seventh, you say, "Clearly, what writers say Jesus said, is not necessarily what he did say. Possibly he was both wiser and more careful in his actual statements than what he is reported to have said." This comes precariously close to a defense of Jesus in light of the fact that you provide no contradictory data. This, too, like some earlier assertions, should not have been allowed to go unchallenged. All that Christians know about Jesus comes from scripture and all that Jesus is known to have said comes from scripture. So, if you want to know what Jesus said, you will have to go to scripture. Anyone who dislikes or denies what Jesus is alleged to have said will have to take it up with the writers of scripture because they are the source, the only source. And since it is safe to assume the gospels' authors are in a much better position to know what Jesus said, if anything, than modern critics, it is incumbent upon liberals and other dissenters to provide evidence to the contrary. On this point I would agree with the fundamentalists. To merely go through the Bible and say willy nilly that Jesus said this and not that simply because the latter don't seem like the kinds of comments he would have made is not going to fly. If liberals think Jesus is "both wiser and more careful in his actual statements than what he is reported to have said" then they are going to have to come up with something far more substantive than what I have read so far.

And eighth, you relay the liberal position by saying, "Such overstated passages, as well as folkloric miracle stories, and contradictory narratives, and muddled advice, and irrational theology, could all be the product of flawed writers" without asking how a perfect book emanating from a perfect being could have flawed writers. And you add to this by allowing the following liberal defense to also go unchallenged. "Jesus could still be the primary source of divine wisdom in human history. The seeker continually looks for the kernel of truth behind the alleged words of Jesus." Jesus "could" be a lot of things, but the question is what does the evidence show. All we have to go by is the Book. Who says these are the "alleged" words of Jesus? The Bible says these "are" the words of Jesus. There is nothing "alleged" about them. Again who are these sources who claim they know more about what Jesus said than those who wrote the gospels. What are their credentials and from whence comes their evidence?

In essence, the problem I have with your account is that although the summary in the last 5 paragraphs is commendable too many liberal defenses and explanations in the body of your letter were allowed to pass unchallenged and unrefuted. You provided a good synopsis of why the liberal position is without merit but you did not adequately explain why their specific arguments were without substance. If their positions are allowed to pass unchecked or unanswered, that could very well give readers the impression that you are either implicitly agreeing or you have no effective counteracting response. I hope you take these admonitions in the spirit intended, but I couldn't in good conscience fail to articulate them.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #713 from MJ of Andover, Mass.

Dear Dennis. Just got the December issue of BE and I am glad to see the letter by RH of Dayton, Ohio, addressing the issue of how to deal with slippery LIBERAL Christians. I've found that fundamentalist and liberals are such different animals that they require quite different lines of argument. You can argue about Noah's ark for hours with the former, but the latter will dismiss the issue as irrelevant before you even finish a sentence.

I thought RH's letter (about the limits of broad interpretations of Jesus's promise that prayer will be granted in Matt. 18:19) presented an excellent case against the liberal who tends to accuse critics of Christianity of literalist interpretations, when in fact we are simply trying to hold the passage within the range of what it was intended to mean.

I'm guessing the liberal's response to RH's letter would be that Jesus did not necessarily say that: Matthew said that Jesus said it; and we must make allowances for Matthew's understandably excessive zeal. At that point I would press the concept that if the bulk of Jesus's key teachings are not what Jesus actually said, if the Biblical Jesus as understood by the writers is not the "real" Jesus, then they are making up their own Jesus and creating their own theology. Call it something else, but don't call it Christianity.

Apr. 1997

A national periodical focusing on Biblical errors, contradictions, and fallacies, while providing a hearing for apologists

COMMENTARY

This month's issue will continue our analysis of the apologetic work entitled The Bible Has the Answer by apologists Morris and Clark.

REVIEW

THE BIBLE HAS THE ANSWER (Part 2)--Ninth, while outlining some fundamentalist theology on page 17 Morris and Clark make an unscriptural comment with respect to the Trinity. They say, "The teaching of the Bible concerning the Trinity might be summarized thus. God is a Tri-unity, with each Person of the Godhead equally and fully eternally God. Each is necessary, and each is distinct, and yet all are one.... The Son proceeds from the Father, and the Spirit from the Son." Where does Scripture say the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Son? If anything, it is the other way around according to Matt. 1:18-20 ("When as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost...for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost"). According to Matthew the Holy Ghost gave rise to Jesus not vice versa.

Then Morris and Clark proceed to add absurdity to inaccuracy by saying, "Though these relationships seem paradoxical, and to some completely impossible, they are profoundly realistic, and their truth is ingrained deep in man's nature.... Thus, the truth of God's tri-unity is ingrained in man's very nature...." Now our illustrious duo is getting just plain silly! Speaking for myself, and no doubt millions of others, I can say categorically that there is nothing deep, or even shallow for that matter, in my nature telling me that there is a triune God who created the Son, who, in turn, created the Holy Spirit. Their attitude could easily fall under the category of religious arrogance with a liberal sprinkling of narrow mindedness.

Then they say, "the truth of the tri-une nature of the Creator is clearly implied by the profoundly tri-une nature of the Creation. Thus the physical cosmos is clearly a tri-universe of Space, Matter, and Time and each of these is co-extensive with the entire universe." One is tempted to say, "But haven't you heard of the Fifth Dimension." But seriously, this infatuation with the number three is nothing more than superstitious nonsense. Working on that theory I could more accurately say God is a duality since nearly every aspect of life has an opposite. Smart versus stupid, in versus out; up versus down, hot versus cold, tall versus short, rich versus poor, birth and death, cause and effect, growth and decay and so on ad infinitum. In fact, this kind of "logic" could very easily be used to negate the Trinity entirely. One could just as easily argue for strict monotheism by alleging that everything in existence is one of a kind, unique, sui generis, and therefore God must be one of a kind, a unity, sui generis. No two things are identical, if for no other reason than the fact that their locations are different.

One can't help but note another major contradiction in this regard. Fundamentalists and other religionists constantly accuse atheists, agnostics, humanists and other freethinkers of having "bigheads," if you will, but that is exactly what is being displayed so vividly by Morris and Clark. They say, "Thus the physical cosmos is clearly a tri-universe of Space, Matter, and Time and each of these is co-extensive with the entire universe." Talking about believing you know it all! How do they know these are the only three dimensions in the universe? For some serious scholars a Fourth Dimension is a real possibility. Have Morris and Clark been throughout the entire universe and do they possess infinite knowledge? They have no way of verifying or demonstrating that comment. They are guilty of that which fundamentalists so freely attribute to their detractors.

Tenth, while on this concept of an eternal creator, they state on page 22, "Our minds cannot really grasp the idea of an eternal God, existing independently of the universe which He created.... But what we cannot comprehend, we can believe. Millions of people through the ages have found mental and spiritual rest through simple faith...." They may have found rest but did they find truth. That's the issue. I may find rest, comfort, and solace in believing I will live for centuries or hit the lottery for tens of millions, but that doesn't make it so.

Eleventh, additional evidence that biblicists feel the universe revolves around them comes to the fore on page 24 through Morris and Clark's reliance upon and citation of Psalm 8:6 ("Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet"). While quoting this verse they say, "It was only man who was "created in the image of God" (Gen. 1:27).... All other things were created for man's use and control. We see, therefore, that the physical and biological creations were made for the service of man. It may be noted in passing that this fact points up one of the many absurdities of the evolutionary theory. Since the creation was entirely man's dominion, it is incredible that the Creator would have forced the earth and its other organic inhabitants to endure a five-billion year preamble of confused and meaningless existence before its master was ever to try to comprehend and order it."

In the first place, Morris and Clark are afflicted with philosophical myopia because they are receiving their belief that everything is man's plaything from a book that is itself flawed throughout. How can they be sure this is not another flaw?

But even more importantly, their egocentric version of history has led them to believe that confusion reigned on the earth prior to man's appearance. How so? The laws of nature and the laws of physics worked quite well and life progressed inexorably. So where was the confusion? Life evolved from lower to higher forms and intelligence increased steadily. So where is the meaninglessness? Sounds like progress to me, be it ever so slow. Why must man be present to have meaningful existence and no confusion? In fact, some people feel the opposite is true; confusion only arises with the arrival of man. The problem lies not with any absurdity on the part of evolutionary theory but with the degree to which the warped variation of solipsism exhibited by anti-evolutionists has perverted their thought processes.

Eleventh, while discussing their hero our deceptive duo state on page 28, "He, alone, of all men who ever lived, conquered death itself. By all the rules of evidence, His bodily resurrection from the grave can be proved the best-proved fact of all history." Is there no end to apologetic hyperbole, falsifications, and exaggerations? Their own book, the Bible, shows that he was not only not the only person to conquer death but he wasn't even the first. We made this point years ago and listed many biblical figures who returned to life before him.

And to say that "His bodily resurrection from the grave can be proved the best-proved fact of all history" is too ridiculous to discuss. I have photograph after photograph, artifact after artifact, living witness after living witness, document after document, confession after confession, audio recording after audio recording, video recording after video recording to prove that the Holocaust actually occurred. Christian adherents to belief in a real Jesus and a real Resurrection can only dream about having that much evidence in their favor. Support of that magnitude would be beyond their wildest imaginings. Christians have no living witnesses, no artifacts, no photographs, no video, no audio and their only documents and testimonies are confined to a book that is so obviously prejudiced and tendentious in its portrayal of what allegedly occurred that no one with any real concern for accuracy and objectivity would dare accept it without extra biblical corroboration.

Twelfth, on page 31 Morris and Clark really jumbled their jive when they said regarding the birth of Jesus, "Although He was born in the family of David, it must be remembered that neither of His earthly parents was connected with Him genetically. He was conceived by the Holy Ghost and simply placed in the womb of the Virgin Mary." In effect, our apologetic friends are admitting there is no biological link between Jesus and David. And if Jesus is not a physical descendant of David, then there is no way he could be the messiah. The messiah must come out of the loins of David according to Scripture; that is an absolute requirement. Realizing the seriousness of their admission, Morris and Clark hastened to add the following footnote. "This does not imply that Christ was not born of 'the seed of David' (Romans 1:4), since He was nurtured from the moment of conception until birth in the womb of Mary, who was herself of David's seed." How this explanation reconciles the problem is any-one's guess. Whether or not Mary is genetically connected to David is immaterial. We are concerned with the connection of Jesus to David through her. That's what matters. And Jesus, by their own admission, has no physical connection to her. Mary may have been of David's seed, but Jesus was not, and that's all that counts. In the same footnote they say, "The special formation of His body assured its complete freedom from inherited physical defects as well as from a sin-nature inherited from Mary." It may have freed him from inheriting any sin nature, but it also relieved him of any valid claim to the messiahship. What he gained in the right hand he lost from the left.

And thirteenth, one of the more powerful but rarely noticed aspects of this whole Jesus-is-God-in-the-flesh mythology is the degree to which it turns God into a racist. Morris and Clark state, "One of the most remarkable features of the gospel records is that they give no information whatever about the physical appearance of the Lord Jesus Christ. Whether he was tall or short, lean or heavy, dark or light in complexion, bearded or clean-shaven--no one knows.... We do not even know that His features were 'Jewish' in character." Although all of this is correct, they failed to note that his features are not nearly as important as the fact that he had to have some definite physical characteristics and that generates a major dilemma. No matter what Jesus looked like, he couldn't have looked like Martin Luther King (Negroid), John F. Kennedy (Caucasian) and Mao Tse-tung (mongoloid) at the same time. In order to enter the world as a man, God had to make a racial choice. He had to prefer or select one race over all others.

I have always been intrigued by the fact that blacks in the Catholic Church, for example, will worship before a crucifix with a white man attached. They seem completely oblivious to the fact that they have been acculturated to accept a non-black as their savior without even being aware of the unavoidable racism attached. How many whites would be willing to worship before a cross with a crucified black man nailed thereto? No doubt this consideration contributes in some degree to the transition of so many blacks from Christianity to Islam. They view the former as a white man's religion.

The situation with respect to women is no better. Women have been so accustomed through biblical pronouncements and cultural conditioning to think of men as the superior wing of the species, that it never dawns on millions to ask themselves why God chose a man to be their savior rather than a woman. Any self-respecting woman should find that aspect of Christianity alone to be not only offensive but degrading. It's as if women can't do anything of real significance on their own. They have to have a man to bail them out. One could pose the same question to women that was earlier asked of blacks. How many men would be willing to pray before a crucifix on which a woman is nailed? Regardless of how women view the situation, god had to have made a sexist decision before entering the world. He could not have entered as a man and woman simultaneously, and since he chose to enter as a man, rather than a woman, the conclusion is inescapable. (To Be Continued Next Month)

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #714 from NL of Annapolis, Maryland

...You know that I am an ardent admirer of your great works, including your excellent logic (I always want to incorrectly say "logics"), and I do not wish to appear in agreement with the writer of Letter #693, but I have previously and again now challenge your claim that you do not have to prove it when you say that X contradicts Y, while you CORRECTLY demand HE WHO ALLEGES MUST PROVE.... Now you say that a black white horse is a contradiction. Assuming that you are a white man, and work with your white horse in a coal mine all day and come out on a pitch black night, I believe that you could very well be a black white man riding a black white horse. So much for you not needing to prove a contradiction....

Editor's Response to Letter #714

You have been a loyal supporter of BE for years NL and we have rarely disagreed, but on this point an exception is clearly justified. Your analogy isn't even apropos to the original contradiction All you have is an all black horse coming out of the mine. Where is the white? Your attempted reconciliation of this problem is without substance. Originally the horse was white, and now it's black. That is not only not contradictory, but it is quite possible and has even occurred on occasion. What I want to see is a horse that is all black and all white simultaneously, not sequentially. I want to see white and black at the same time, not one after the other or side by side as on a zebra. You completely missed the dilemma and took out on a tangent

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #712 from MJ Continues from Last Month (Part b)

(Last Month we published the first part of MJ's article entitled Why I Am Not a Liberal Christian. We concluded it by saying, "Next month MJ will describe the real biblical Jesus." He will now proceed as promised--Ed.)

One: He believed fully in the OT and its cruel God. He said "Scripture cannot be broken" (John 10:35). He said "not a jot or tittle" of it would be changed (Matt. 5:18).

Two: Disrespected his parents. He said "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" to his mother (John 2:4). He offers no apology whatever after disappearing from his parents for three days when he was 12 (Luke 2:50).

Three: Was ethnocentric. He said he was "not sent except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. 15:24). He said it is not good "to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs" (Matt. 15:26).

Four: Accepted slavery. He relates a parable in which he supports a servant being "beaten with many stripes" (Luke 12:47). He implicitly supports the institution of slavery in Luke 17:7-10.

Five: Supported an ascetic view of life. He praises self-made eunuchs (Matt. 19:12). He said "he who hates his life in this world will keep it for eternity" (John 12:25).

Six: Supported wishful thinking over hard work. He claims you can receive whatever you pray for (Mark 11:20-24). That is simply not true. He claims you can literally move mountains by faith (Matt. 21:17-22). Virtually every liberal Christian assumes the moving of mountains passage is figurative; but it's not. Read the context. He was NOT speaking figuratively, any more than he was in Luke 17:6 when he speaks of removing "this mulberry tree" by faith.

Christians are brainwashed to selectively ignore context, and to interpret figuratively with no justification. The proper line of reasoning is not the Christian mind-set of: "it's obviously not true literally, so therefore it must be figurative." Rather, the honest line of reasoning is: "the context is literal, so therefore this is, in fact, nonsense, mere rhetoric unworthy of someone claiming to speak for God." You cannot literally move a mountain by faith. Jesus is just selling dreams.

Seven: he believed in a utopian world, one very much at odds with reality. He claims in Matt. 6:26 and 6:34 that God will feed you just as he feeds the birds, when in fact God frequently does neither! Starving Somalians would hardly find Jesus's discourse here edifying. And Jesus obviously did not know that the actual starvation rate of sparrows is often 50%.

The Encyclopedia Americana, 1992, Vol. 3, p. 795 says, "The first year is the most difficult one in the life of a bird. In most species the mortality rate for young birds during the first year is about 50%, but in some species it may reach as high as 80% to 90%."

New Scientist, Jan., 1969, pp. 121-122, reports that one third of adult birds and four fifths of their offspring die of starvation every year.

An honest seeker must worship only the Real God, not some product of wishful thinking that doesn't square with the harsher aspects of reality. As soon as you deny reality, you are no longer worshiping the Real God. It's His world. He created it, and He is clearly not omnibenevolent, only, in this seeker's conviction, ultimately benevolent.

Eight: Contradicted himself. He said "all who take the sword will perish by the sword" (Matt. 26:52), yet he tells his apostles "he who has no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one" (Luke 22:36).

He says not to call people fools (Matt. 5:22) yet he himself does so in Matt. 23:17.

Nine: Constantly overstated things. He claims lust is as bad as adultery (Matt. 5:28). He claims anger is as bad as killing (Matt. 5:21-22). First John 3:15 says, "Whoever hates his brother is a murderer." That is hardly true; there is a major difference.

The Christian would claim that Jesus is using hyperbole to point out that what is in your heart is what counts. Agreed, but in making that point any valid teacher of morality would not so carelessly jettison the critical distinction between a murderous thought and a murderous deed.

Ten: Gave bad advice. He advises forgiving 70 times 7 times (Matt. 18:22), which makes repentance a joke and forgiveness meaningless.

He claims remarriage is equivalent to adultery (Matt. 5:22). Yet this claim does not seem to stop many liberal Christian ministers from justifying second marriages, either their own or their parishioners'.

Eleven: Was intolerant. He ends a parable with, "But bring here those enemies of mine, who did not want me to reign over them, and slay them before me" (Luke 19:27). Note well that the purpose of a parable is to teach proper insights and attitudes and note that the nobleman in the parable represents Jesus.

In Luke 10:14-16 he equates rejecting him to rejecting God.

Twelve: Lastly, and probably worst of all, Jesus taught Hell. In Matt. 25:41 he says, "Depart from me, you cursed, into the everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." And in verse 46 "these will go away into everlasting punishment...."

There you have the biblical Jesus. Instead of being someone who inspires the seeker's respect or affection, he's a religious fanatic.

The seeker also becomes convinced that what goes on in liberal seminaries - putting a positive spin on any dubious passage about Jesus - is a pervasive rationalization process. Because the Christian structure is there and well-established, everyone is locked into an ultimately positive assessment of Jesus and Christianity.

Christian hermeneutics always asks, "How do we make sense of this passage?" and never asks "Does this passage make sense?" A verdict of nonsense is the consistently overlooked option. Divine wisdom is presumed erroneously.

And even when the liberal does agree to a verdict of nonsense or error, he claims it made sense in the cultural context of that time, and therefore somehow has some validity. The seeker, on the other hand, claims that divine wisdom must transcend culture and that no cultural context justifies Old Testament immoralities such as concubines, genocides, and burning witches. What is spiritual error today was spiritual error then, it's just the same!

Another maneuver dear to the hearts of liberals involves redefining the meaning of words in order to make concepts more palatable to modern sensibilities. For example, the word "dragons" become "jackals"; "everlasting fire" becomes "separation from God"; "castration" becomes "celibacy", etc.

Our seeker decides that the liberals may be interpreting the Bible more sensibly, but not correctly or honestly. And he concludes that liberal Christianity is not a valid option. (Next Month MJ will conclude his critique of liberal Christianity--Ed.).

Editor's Response to Letter #712 (Part b)

Your analysis is quite good and often poignant, MJ. I especially like your comment that "Christian hermeneutics always asks, 'How do we make sense of this passage?' and never asks 'Does this passage make sense?' A verdict of nonsense is the consistently overlooked option." How right you are!

Another astute observation on your part is found in #6 where you say, "The proper line of reasoning is not the Christian mind-set of: 'it's obviously not true literally, so therefore it must be figurative.' Rather, the honest line of reasoning is: 'the context is literal, so therefore this is, in fact, nonsense, mere rhetoric unworthy of someone claiming to speak for God.'" Excellent point! You are quite adept at encapsulating rather broad issues in relatively terse and accurate summations.

Nevertheless, I still have a reservation and an augmentation. My reservation pertains to your comments in point #7 that "an honest seeker must worship only the Real God and as soon as you deny reality, you are no longer worshiping the Real God. It's His world. He created it, and He is clearly not omnibenevolent, only, in this seeker's conviction, ultimately benevolent." I realize your theistic philosophy is very much in the tradition of the deist Thomas Paine who also rejected the Bible, Jesus, and Scripture's presentation of "God" while believing in an ultimately benevolent supreme being, but I would only again ask that you provide some corroboration for your beliefs. I see no evidence of divine benevolence, ultimate or otherwise.

My augmentation pertains to your statement that a seeker "becomes convinced that what goes on in liberal seminaries - putting a positive spin on any dubious passage about Jesus - is a pervasive rationalization process." Based upon my experience, this is no less true of fundamentalist seminaries. Indeed, rationalizing, justifying, and obfuscating lie at the core of their strategy as well.

Letter #716 from RH of Hubbard, Ohio

Dear Dennis.... In talking with a local minister, I got bogged down on the Graf-Wellhausen Theory. I forgot your admonition to stick with the biblical text. In the end I did, but I don't believe I was too convincing.... My wife is on the pulpit committee of the First Baptist Church. She is sworn to secrecy and I am in the dark as to what is going on, but the trend is to more radical, rightwing, thinkers. Our best seminaries (?--Ed.) are suffering from too few students. The very conservative ones are enjoying full student bodies.....

Editor's Response to Letter #716

You might want to keep in mind what I said about repeatedly returning to encounters with additional information each time. As I have often said, don't expect to convert somebody in 30 minutes from something they have believed for 30 years.

I must say, however, that in recent years I have been steadily approaching the conclusion that your biggest problem is going to be one of getting religionists in general and biblicists in particular to listen to anything of a critical nature, whether it be on the Bible, atheism, agnosticism, Jesus, science, Creationism, history or whatever. As I have often said, there is none so deaf as he who won't hear and nowhere is this more evident than in regard to religion. Fortunately not all biblicists are that way but there can be no doubt it applies to far too many.

Letter #717 from Norman Slocum, 308 McColsky Ave., Brandon, Florida 33510

Dear Mr. McKinsey. I was wondering if any readers could help me find information on the following organizations: Walk Away and Fundamentalists Anonymous. I recently found information on the Internet about Walk Away but I was unable to find any addresses or subscription or membership information. Fundamentalists Anonymous distributed tapes through AHA (American Humanist Association) two years ago, which I purchased. But I've seen no further publicity on it since then. Is it defunct? Any assistance given by you or your readers will be appreciated.

Dear Norman. I know very little about FA and even less about Walk Away. I contacted FA years ago but was disappointed with their response, perhaps I should say lack thereof, to my inquiries, as well as my offers to work in concert. So they went their way and I went mine and never have the twain met. Others may be able to provide you with some information and for that reason we included your full name and address.

We have always been much more concerned with creating and fostering an informed group of dedicated, motivated fighters and communicators than promoting support groups to not only hold our hand and provide comfort in a religiously-dominated society but provide assurance that our anti-Bible and/or anti-religious philosophy is justified. The absence of qualms, reservations, and insecurities allows me to proceed on a for more rational, effective, and proactive basis.

Letter #718 from AH of Chicago, Illinois

(In the 711th letter in the Feb. 1997 issue TS from Prescott, Arizona, noted that our tapes were not coming through very well on the local channel and was suspicious of foul play. The director of that station learned about his letter in BE and wrote us the following reply which we are publishing in the interest of evenhandedness--Ed.)

Mr. McKinsey: A member of the Prescott Access Center informed me of a complaint against the center published in your most recent newsletter. This particular complaint suggested that staff members at this facility were involved in censoring programs from the Biblical Errancy series. I want to assure you that is not the case. The situation in question involved an episode that was pulled from one tape machine and placed into another due to technical trouble with the tape playback. The episode was interrupted only for a minute or two. However, viewers of your series have probably noticed that several episodes have experienced video difficulties. Those difficulties are primarily the result of tapes sent to us for playback -- I understand that episode's copies are third generation and copied on home video equipment. I also understand that copies are not made from the master due to the cost of tapes used to create the masters. I would be happy to discuss your options in recording masters and making copies, so that you might make higher quality copies for channels cablecasting your series. You can reach me during regular business hours Monday through Friday. In the meantime, episodes from your series that meet technical requirements will continue to be cablecast on Prescott Access Channel 13. The program content of your series is not now nor has it ever been an issue, and censorship will not be tolerated while I manage the Prescott Access Center.

Editor's Response to Letter #718

Dear Director. I have no way of knowing the facts of the situation but as far as the technical production aspects are concerned your understanding is essentially correct. We use cable access equipment and all recordings occur in their cable access studio. All programs are recorded on SVHS tapes (Super VHS) of broadcast quality. We then record regular tapes from these Supers in the studio because the only VCR's we have access to that will play Supers are in the studio. We then use these regular tapes in home video equipment as masters for copying tapes we send out. In effect, you are correct. Those receiving programs are viewing 3rd generation tapes. That is the only way we could operate. The station mandates that all tapes be recorded with Supers and we do not have any equipment that will play Supers. This, in turn, forces us to record a regular tape from the Super in the studio in order to get an original to take home and use as a master. We knew from the beginning that that would adversely affect the clarity of the programs, but we were not sure how much. Apparently it is more than we anticipated in some instances. What we need is a VCR that will play and record Super VHS tapes and this kind of unit costs between $600 and $700. Then we could take the Supers home immediately after the programs are recorded and use them as our masters. That would mean those purchasing tapes would be receiving 2nd generation tapes rather than 3rd generation and they would be getting programs recorded from higher quality SVHS tapes rather than regular tapes. In the meantime, could you give me some idea of the programs, if any, that need to be recopied and what changes you would suggest? Making TV programs is not the easiest activity in which I have been involved. Technical problems, financial considerations, scheduling conflicts, enlisting volunteers, finding time, and writing scripts are taxing to say the least.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Although additional assistance has come on board a couple of volunteers playing our programs have failed to proceed beyond the first few programs without explaining why. We are extremely interested in knowing why these individuals stopped playing our programs in their areas and if they would contact us in order to clarify the situation it would be greatly appreciated. I don't know if it was because of intimidation, quality, time, or what, but I'd sure like to know. To those who ceased playing our programs I say, please contact us ASAP. There is no way we can rectify a situation without first discovering the nature of the problem. As you know, I place a very high priority on playing these programs throughout the nation and any obstacles need to be overcome with all due haste.

May 1997

A national periodical focusing on Biblical errors, contradictions, and fallacies, while providing a hearing for apologists

COMMENTARY

This month's issue will conclude our analysis of the apologetic work entitled The Bible Has the Answer by apologists Morris and Clark.

REVIEWS

THE BIBLE HAS THE ANSWER (Part 3) Fourteenth, On page 35 the authors got carried away in their admiration for Jesus by saying, "Thus the perfect holiness of Jesus Christ was openly demonstrated to men and angels and devils, when he was tempted in all things, yet without sin. Furthermore, because he has personally experienced the whole gamut of Satan testing, He perfectly understands every temptation and trial to which we may ever be subject." To this one can only say, Where on earth are they getting all this? Where does the Bible say that Jesus "was tempted in all things" and "experienced the whole gamut of Satan testing"? It never ceases to amaze me how often biblicists get enwrapped by their own exuberance and embellish the text.

Fifteenth, on the next page Morris and Clark add to their excessive zeal by saying, "The Virgin Birth, of course, in addition to requiring a biological miracle, would also imply that Jesus Christ was absolutely unique among men..." In light of the fact that a virgin birth is not miraculous, it could not possibly provide any evidence that "Jesus Christ was absolutely unique among men." Thousands of women routinely visit sperm banks and later deliver children without having had sexual contact with a male. Indeed, many have had no contact with the donor whatever, and would not recognize him if he walked through the doorway. This constant infatuation with a virgin birth by Christians is indicative of a mentality from a by-gone era in which scientific advancements were crude at best.

On the next page Morris and Clark state, "The objection of the modern liberal that such an event would be impossible because it is contrary to biological law is quite vacuous. This is the whole point--the Virgin Birth was a mighty miracle..." This argument is something of a straw man in light of the fact that any reasonably informed liberal knows that virgin births are not only possible but quite common. Virgin births are by no means miraculous.

In regard to this same subject, Morris and Clark state on page 37, "There are many other references in the gospels and epistles from which the Virgin Birth, even though not explicitly mentioned, is clearly inferred. For example, Paul says, "When the fullness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman" (Gal. 4:4). How this substantiates a virgin birth is something of a quandary in view of the fact that it does not rule out the presence of a sperm. What does "made of a woman" mean precisely? It does not say the son was made only from a woman, nor does it exclude prior fertilization by a male. And what does "sent forth" mean? In a religious context it can be interpreted in several ways. People occasionally say a child was sent to them by god or was a gift from god or could not have been had without god's help. But none of them are claiming coitus never occurred.

Sixteenth, on page 43 the authors utter that old hype that "Christ suffered and died, 'more than any man'." No, he didn't. Many people have suffered longer and more agonizing deaths.

Seventeenth, on the same page they state, "The crucifixion of Jesus Christ, by normal human standards of right and wrong, seems to have been the greatest miscarriage of justice in all the history of the world." Fortunately for them they qualified their remarks with the subjective word "seems," because I know of no objective evidence that would authenticate that comment. The killing of approximately 6,000,000 innocent Jewish civilians in WWII, alone, would seem to be a little more appalling than the death of a single individual.

Eighteenth, on page 45 they utter an odd variation on a kind of ex post facto law by stating, "Thus it finally comes to this: each one of us, individually, is responsible for the death of Christ. It was the sins of each man that nailed Him to the cross." How the sins of people who lived long after the crucifixion could be responsible for the crucifixion itself is an enigma to say the least. According to Morris and Clark Jesus is allegedly being punished for the acts of people yet to live. As if it was not bad enough having children punished for the sins of their father (Adam) under Original Sin, now, in effect, we have a kind of father (Jesus) being punished for the sins of children yet to be born. Is there no end to biblical injustices?

Nineteenth, on page 64 Morris and Clark employ the old switcheroo trick in which the burden of truth is insidiously shifted, in this case to justify miracles. They state, "To say that miracles are impossible is actually to deny that God exists." Who said miracles are impossible? This publication certainly never has. All we have ever done is ask for evidence for their existence, and since none has ever been forthcoming, the conclusion is inescapable. Since miracles can not be proven or verified, one would be foolish, indeed, to believe in something for which no corroboration can be provided, other than personal testimony. If the latter is their sole means of support, then miracles have no viable foundation. And if proof for the existence of God rests on proof for the existence of miracles, then so much for theism. Based upon the amount of miraculous data provided to-date, that pretty well disposes of any reliable belief in a supreme being.

As proof they say, "Providential miracles still occur today. Every believing and practicing Christian knows from personal experience that God does answer prayer...." They do? How? If only they would be as forthcoming with evidence as they are with unsubstantiated assertions! They may feel it; they may believe it; they may wish it; they may even crave it with every fiber of their being, but that does not prove it's real any more than my believing I am the reincarnation of Abe Lincoln is proven by mere assertion and intense belief on my part. In order to provide an argument of substance, they'll have to produce something more heady than personal testimonies, which seem to form the foundation of their theology.

Twentieth. In their never-ending quest to portray science as either an ally or a deferential protagonist of religion in general and the Bible in particular, the authors state on page 62, "The fact is, however, that true science has always confirmed the Bible." Now they are being just plain silly, because facts are very much to the contrary. Not only has BE discussed this issue in some detail, but the 11th chapter of our book clearly describes numerous clashes between science and the Bible.

As a specific example of cooperation, they say in regard to the long day of Joshua, "That the earth should stop rotating on its axis for a time is no more inexplicable than that it should start rotating in the beginning." Leaving aside the fact that there is absolutely no credible scientific evidence, whatever, that the earth ever stopped rotating on its axis, the critical point to note is that biblicists appear to be wholly incapable of understanding what this would have entailed. Although not a scientist by trade, I can say with a high degree of confidence that if the centrifugal force caused by the earth's rotation at approximately 1,000 miles an hour were to cease, the results would be incalculable and result in the death of virtually every living organism on the planet. The power of gravity would take quantum leaps, causing every living thing to be pulled downward with horrendous force. Imagine what that would do to pumping hearts, expanding lungs, flowing blood, moving legs, flapping wings, swimming fins, undulating tails, and atmospheric/oceanographic pressures!

Twenty-first, on page 80 Morris and Clark say, "The God of the Bible is a God of order and of grace, not a God of confusion and cruelty." Too bad they didn't read Issues 115-120 of BE before making this inane comment, because evidence to the contrary is overwhelming. Indeed, the God of the OT not only exhibits cruelty on a regular basis but many other negative traits as well.

Twenty-second, interesting enough, on page 137 we have one of the few valid and substantive admissions by Morris and Clark. They state, "It is in the Bible, and the Bible alone, that we have any real information about Christ or his teachings." If only they had been around to back me up when I confronted biblicists alleging Josephus, Tacitus, Suetonius, Pliny the Younger, and others provide extrabiblical evidence for the existence of Jesus Christ 2,000 years ago.

Twenty-third. On page 153 they say, "While some modern errorists present Christ going to the cross under protest against the unthinkable cruel Father, Scripture shows the Father and son in perfect harmony throughout redemption." Since these alleged errorists have interpreted Scripture correctly, there is no error on their part. If there is any error, it lies in Morris and Clark's determination to present the relationship between God and Jesus as harmonious throughout, when it was by no means one of "perfect harmony." In Matt. 27:46 Jesus said on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" According to some, these words actually mean in Hebrew: "My God, my God why hast thou sacrificed me?" Prior to the crucifixion Jesus fell on his face in the Garden of Gethsemane and said, "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." The word "cup" in this instance comes from a Hebrew word which means "fate" or in this instance "death." If there is anything these verses do not demonstrate it is a harmony of wills and views between Jesus and God.

Twenty-fourth, on page 167 we are told that, "The Bible claims, many hundreds of time, to be the written Word of God." To that one can only say: It does? Where? Except possibly for 2 Tim. 3:16 ("All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness") and 2 Peter 1:21 ("For the prophecy came not in old times by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost"), one would be hard pressed to find any verses of this nature. John 10:35 ("If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came, and the scripture cannot be broken..."), 1 Cor. 2:13 ("Which things also we speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth: comparing spiritual things with spiritual"), and John 16:13 ("Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come") are quite weak and could hardly be used to make a strong case.

The comments in Timothy and Peter also conflict with verses such as 1 Cor. 7:6 ("But I speak this by permission, and not of commandment"), 7:12 ("But to the rest speak I, not the Lord..."), 7:25 ("Now concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful") and 2 Cor. 11:17 ("That which I speak, I speak, it not after the Lord, but as it were foolishly, in this confidence of boasting") which all but state some of Scripture is not divinely inspired. Any assertion to the effect that the Bible says hundreds of times that it is divinely inspired is a gross exaggeration to say the least.

Twenty-fifth, while confronting the problem of how evil emerged and why God created Satan, Morris and Clark state on page 307, "God did not create Satan as an evil being. However, the angels, like man, were created as free spirits, not as unthinking machines. They were fully able to reject God's will if they should choose to do so." How could they be "fully able to reject God's will," if God created them. If they were God's creation, then every aspect of their being had to have been correctly formed, in which case they could not have chosen to do the wrong. This is nothing more than a variation on the "Adam was created perfect so how could he have sinned" problem which we have discussed on several occasions. No matter how much biblicists may worm and squirm, they will never be able to escape this fundamental dilemma in their theology. Morris and Clark say they were "fully able to reject God's will if they should choose to do so." But how could they choose to do so when a perfect being created them. Are they trying to tell us that the omniscient, perfect Almighty created a being that chose to do evil? God created something that was not perfect? God created something that chose to reject perfection? The perfect being made something that was either flawed or chose to do a flawed act, which, in turn, only proves it was flawed? The perfect being created the imperfect? If the perfect being created the imperfect, then he only proved he isn't perfect and couldn't be god. And if the perfectly created being chose to do the imperfect, then it only proved it wasn't perfect to begin with and couldn't have been created by God because everything God does by definition is perfect.

Twenty-sixth. In recent years increasing numbers of biblicists have been soft-peddling the whole idea of hell and what it entails. In order to keep church pews more occupied and scare as few as possible, many ministers and priests have chosen to replace hellfire and damnation with something more amenable and less frightening. To alienate as few as possible, they have projected an image of hell that is more in keeping with polish than perdition. The idea of "burning in hell" has been superseded by the more acceptable "separation from God" concept. On page 311 Morris and Clark are asked how a loving God can send anyone to eternal punishment in hell and they reply by saying, "God will not force people into heaven against their wills. Such people will actually be less miserable in hell than they would be in heaven." Not if they are burning they won't! They state, "Essentially hell is the place where all aspects of the presence of God will be completely withdrawn forever. Hell is thus eternal separation from God. As the Scripture says, it is a place where men shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power (2 Thess. 1:9). Unfortunately for them, hell involves much more than mere separation from God as is shown by: Matt. 3:12 ("His winnowing fork is in his hand, and he will clear his threshing floor and gather his wheat into the granary, but the chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire"), Matt. 18:8-9 ("...it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into everlasting fire. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire"), Mark 9:44 ("Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched"), Rev. 20:10 ("And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever"), Rev. 14:11 ("And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever: and they have no rest day or night"), and Matt 25:46 ("And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal") The original concept of hell as a place of eternal torture by fire and brimstone is far more Scripturally sustainable than much of what they are trying to pawn off today, and all attempts to make it more palatable are biblically unsound. When it comes to permanent punishment, the hellfire and damnation preachers had it right from the beginning.

Twenty-seventh, on page 317 Morris and Clark return us once again to that old nemesis of "judging the already saved." They state, "There is only one thing in life about which each man can be absolutely certain--and that is that he must eventually come before God in judgment." But why he must appear is never explained. According to fundamentalist theology you are saved the moment you accept Jesus Christ as your personal savior. And if that's true, then why come before God for judgment to begin with? What is there to judge? It's all over. Sentence was pronounced and your destiny eternally fixed the day you died, based upon whether or not you accepted Jesus prior to your death. If you did, you are in; if you did not, you're out. Works and deeds are relevant, but immaterial.

Twenty-eighth and lastly, on page 335 Morris and Clark leap into a contradiction they would have done well to have fled. They are asked if the end of the world is near and respond by saying, "According to Scripture, the earth as such will endure forever. For example, Psalm 104:5 says: 'He (meaning God--Ed.) laid the foundation of the earth, that it should not be removed forever'." But they immediately follow this up by quoting verses saying the opposite such as: 'The earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up' (2 Peter 3:10) and (Matt. 24:35) in which Jesus said: 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away' "... Reconciliation of this dichotomy according to them lies in the fact that "the earth will some day be drastically changed and renovated....The earth and its atmospheric heavens will thus not be annihilated but will be completely purged by fire, cleansing it of all age-long effects of sin, decay and death...." Our illustrious duo appear to have difficulty understanding simple English. The text says the earth shall be "burned up" and that entails far more than mere purification and cleansing. When your house is burned up or down, that means your house is no more. It was totally destroyed and has ceased to exist. Our apologetic authors, on the other hand, would apparently have us believe that your house was merely cleansed of impurities by fire. Hardly! Your house is not "renovated" or "purged" by fire when it is burned up; it's annihilated. Why should the words mean anything less with respect to the earth itself, especially when Matt. 24:35 says the earth will "pass away"?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #712 from MJ Concludes from Last Month (Part c)

(Last Month we published the second part of MJ's article entitled Why I Am Not a Liberal Christian. We will now conclude MJ's assault upon liberal Christianity--Ed.).

You--the LIBERAL CHRISTIAN--cannot legitimately accept Jesus as a source of divine wisdom, if you disagree with so much of his basic teachings:

1. The liberal Christian believes in tolerance, but Jesus was intolerant towards unbelievers.
2. The liberal Christian does not accept the inconceivably cruel concept of Hell, yet Jesus believed in it and taught it.
3. The liberal Christian believes there are many ways to God, but Jesus says he is the only way.
4. The liberal Christian sees the God-directed barbarism of the Old Testament as repugnant, yet Jesus accepted the Old Testament with reverence.

5. The liberal Christian sees many stories in the Bible as instructive myths, but, as a matter of course, overlooks the malignant lessons inherent in those very stories!

The flood story warns us against immorality in general, yes, but it also teaches that, except for Noah and his family, every other person in the world, every sweetheart, every best friend, every mother's beloved child, every child's beloved parent, all deserved to drown.

That's a judgment, and a god, that I for one do not accept.

The flood story also conveys a total disregard for animal suffering. Who among us, if we see a dog drowning, is not distraught with compassion? Yet a peripheral lesson of the flood story is that animal suffering, even on a massive scale, is irrelevant, hardly worth mentioning.

Are these valid lessons!? Is this a valid God!?

Take the Adam and Eve story. It warns us against pride, yet, but it also pushes blind obedience as a primary virtue. Curiosity, asking questions, seeking knowledge, are discouraged. Dialogue is discouraged.

The God of Genesis wants undiscerning obedience, the same thing, coincidentally, that oppressive rulers want, which suggests to me that oppressive rulers are behind this story, not God.

In fact, I think the underlying purpose of the Adam and Eve story, is not to teach about the sin of pride, but is to teach obedience. The writer is presenting a mythological tale that encourages people to obey authority without questioning. It's the original propaganda story from those in charge.

It teaches that if you don't do as God wants, your lives will be immeasurably worse off. And it sneaks in the presumption that WE, the writers for the powers that be, will be the ones, of course, to let you know just what God wants.

Fallible human beings claiming to speak for God. It's the oldest trick in the book.

Also contained in the Adam and Eve story is the lesson that women are inferior and subservient. Genesis 2:18 refers to Eve as a "helper comparable" to man, not a companion equal to him. And Genesis 3:16 is very clear as to who is in charge: Your desire is very clear as to who is in charge: "Your desire shall be for your husband, And he shall rule over you."

Is this a valid lesson? I can hear liberal Christian women hemming and hawing right now.

Then there's Abraham's willingness to senselessly kill his son in order to be obedient to God. Abraham did not ask any questions; and for this he is highly praised. Blind obedience is presented as "great faith."

You and I both know that if someone told you today that he was going to sacrifice his son to God, you would call the police and a mental hospital, not praise his "great faith."

I think the real purpose of many Bible stories is not the overt lesson about human nature, but is a subliminal call to group obedience.

Solomon and the cutting in half of the disputed baby story, is not so much a lesson in the nature of a mother's genuine love, as it is an encouragement to trust and follow leadership.

When you think about it, this story, as an insight into human nature, is preposterous - what woman in real life would be both so mean, and so stupid, as to say, "Go ahead, cut the baby in half, Solomon"? The characterization here is at the comic book level.

And upon rereading the story I see that the message is not as subliminal as I thought. First Kings 3:28 is fairly explicit: "And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had rendered; and they feared the king, for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him to administer justice."

Again, in my opinion, the real reason these stories are presented is for control, to validate the authority of those in charge, to claim divine sanction for human agendas, and not for the intrinsic value of the story's wisdom, or the presence of any real divine intention behind it.

But, whether or not Bible stories are used as a control mechanism, my point here is that they contain profoundly harmful adjunct lessons, which liberal Christianity blithely ignores.

6. Most liberal Christians regard one's actual behavior as more important than one's beliefs. Yet a major theme of the Bible is its emphasis not on behavior, but on belief.

The heroes of the Bible include: Abraham the liar, Lot the incest commiter, Moses the murderer, David the adulterer, Solomon the fornicator, Paul the bigot (Titus 1:12). These are all faithful believers rather than men of righteous behavior. The God of the Bible favors the "believer," or groveler to Him, over the man of good character.

The liberal Christian is not justified in embracing a book that emphasizes a type of "righteousness" he himself would find repugnant.

7. A problem the liberal Christian has, is how, if he rejects certain passages, will he decide which passages to reject, which passages to accept? The answer, I think, is the general guideline of accepting those passages which are reasonable, compassionate, and just.

Yet, if he is honest, and does not distort the plain meaning of words in normal discourse, he will find there is too much that is not reasonable, compassionate or just.

The liberal Christian is not justified selecting passages he likes, and ignoring ones he doesn't like (such as the God-directed atrocities in the Old Testament, or Jesus's teachings on remarriage or Hell).

Ambiguity, complexity, and shades of gray in evaluating passages, are a given to the liberal Christian. And so each liberal makes his own judgments by his own lights, which is fine, except that it defeats in large part the presumed purpose of a book of God in the first place, which is to give some clear answers and to reduce ambiguity!

If the liberal's own judgment is the ultimate authority, then he cannot pretend that Jesus is the ultimate source of wisdom.

8. And lastly, the resurrection is presented as real in the Bible, not as a story or myth.

Mark 16:4 says, "He rebuked their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they did not believe those who had seen Him after he had risen."

In John 20:27, Jesus tells doubting Thomas, "Reach your finger here."

In Luke 24:37 it says, "But they were terrified...and supposed they had seen a spirit." Then verse 39: "Handle me and see, for a spirit does not have flesh and bones as you see I have."

The writers were presenting an actual physical resurrection, not a "resurrection of the spirit," as the liberal would interpret it.

If the writers meant what they wrote in the way they wrote it, and denied they were presenting myths ("For we did not follow cunningly devised fables when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eyewitnesses of His majesty"--2 Peter 1:16), then you are putting your trust and faith into people who are in fact...liars.

Real wisdom does not come from such men.

A seeker concludes that the liberal Christian interprets the Bible more sensibly, but not correctly or honestly.

The conservative Christian interprets the Bible more correctly, but that correct interpretation shows that the Bible is a spiritually false document, written by fallible, foolish, immoral men, and is in no way God's word.

Letter #719 from AL of Aurora, Colorado

Dear Dennis. I have received sample issues of BE from you with appreciation and thanks. This world, darkened by superstitious, imbalanced, controlled information, needs severely people like you who are selfless, brave, and wise enough to stand against the fast stream of ignorance. Our children are brainwashed from a very young age. They don't have an opportunity to learn and investigate what is right and what is wrong? Their parents are frightened by a false doctrine of rewards and punishments. The people who speak thousands of times, even millions of times, of love do everything they can to blind their loved-ones, to nullify their ability to think, reason, investigate, and discover the facts. I don't see any love in their hearts.

So please keep doing what you are doing now. A lot of people have the same ideas and feelings as you. Your labor is honored by those who have had their eyes opened. Don't be suppressed by the selfish and ignorant ones who haven't had their eyes opened.

Editor's Response to Letter #719

Dear AL. Suppression by my opponents doesn't hinder my agenda as much as apathy, timidity, and lethargy on the part of too many critics of religion in general and scripture in particular.

Letter #720 from AH of Chicago, Illinois

Dear Mr. McKinsey. A few weeks ago a friend of mine took all of my back issues of Biblical Errancy to use as sources for the final exam in his religion class. When he got them back, I think they had more red ink than black, but he got an "A". I'd like to start a subscription for him, so I can keep my issues a little longer!

Editor's Response to Letter #720

Dear AH. Sounds like your friend is using BE in one of the ways intended. May more "A's" follow!

Letter #721 from JW of Palm Springs, Florida

Dennis. I have the prior issues of BE from #1 thru #156 and need to complete my collection of them all. Please send the remaining back issues and also a Word and Verse Index. I can't begin to tell you how much I appreciate your work. Webster's Dictionary doesn't provide the words of my gratitude to you and your wife for all your efforts. Thank you, Thank you!

EDITOR'S NOTE: As you probably already know the imperious trio who ruled the American Atheist Center in Austin, Texas, M.M. O'Hair, her son, John, and her granddaughter, Robin, disappeared over 18 months ago under very mysterious circumstances and have not been seen since. Speculation has run wild as to what happened. I have been told foul play has been ruled out, despite the fact that they left suddenly without their passports and killing people by bombings, etc., doesn't seem to bother some right-wingers and/or fundamentalist ideologues. I wonder!

In any event, a new leadership has assumed the helm and I have found its membership to be far more amenable to cooperation, sensitivity, teamwork, and affinity than ever existed in the past. Others might want to test the new waters as well. One of the leadership's most intelligent decisions was to appoint Frank Zindler as the new Editor/Managing Editor and his wife Ann as the Associate Editor of their magazine. Although I don't know others in position of authority, I have known Frank for over a decade and have found him to be intelligent, highly informed with respect to languages, science, and religion, and accommodating. He has been the only leader the Ohio Atheists have ever had in so far as I am aware and we have been able to converse on many occasions, since he only lives a few miles from my home. Frank's wisdom is further accentuated by the fact that he has seen fit to include one of my articles in the Spring 1997 issue of the American Atheist, something which would have been unthinkable under Madalyn O'Hair with whom I had less than cordial relations to say the least. My article starts on page 20 and is essentially a synopsis of that part of chapter 25 in my book pertaining to Apologetic Defenses. I am most appreciative of the gracious invitation by Frank to write an article. Submission of the text was, indeed, a unique opportunity to tear down walls and build bridges. I would encourage everyone to obtain a copy, especially if you have not read the pertinent part in my book or this publication.

Issue #174 June 1997, Editor: Dennis McKinsey

A national periodical focusing on Biblical errors, contradictions, and fallacies, while providing a hearing for apologists .

COMMENTARY

This months issue will open with a review of our Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy by the editor of a British publication and conclude with some letters from our readers

REVIEW

Peter Brearey, editor of The Freethinker in Britain, wrote the following article on page 2 of his December 1996 issue. He entitled it "Stand by Holy Writ!" and said,

"I do not allow Christians to treat their Bible like an elderly sack of potatoes from which they may select the more edible spuds while disregarding the rotten ones. They must be made to stand by each fetid jot, not to mention every absurd tittle, of the Scriptures - otherwise it is too easy for all those nice religionists as well as the horrid fundamentalists to perpetuate their ghastly myths. Fortunately, I have Professor Charles Ryrie, of the Dallas Theological Seminary, on my team: 'Can one be a biblicist and deny inerrancy? Not if the Bible teaches its own inerrancy ... If the Bible contains some errors, no matter how few or many, how can one be sure that his understanding of Christ is correct? ... Even if the errors are in supposedly minor matters, any error opens the Bible to suspicion on other points that may not be so minor. If inerrancy falls, other doctrines will fall, too.' In other words, if Adam and the sin of man are denied by the liberals, then the matter of why Jesus died on the cross - the cornerstone of Christian belief - is brought into question, if not actually proven to be useless.

Ryrie is quoted in The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy, almost 600 pages of information, comment and live ammunition for people of our sort, which has been published by Prometheus at £42 (well, what do you think Christmas-present book tokens are for?); it is the work of Dennis McKinsey.

Mr. McKinsey quotes many contemporary Christian writers only to drown them in a potent brew of erudition, irony, and just a hint of cruelty: The Freethinker style, exactly.

But for those of us involved in the day-to-day battle against superstition, the Encyclopedia's real strength is its index: at a glance it is possible to select a matter of current moment and show the Christians what they must believe about it if they are not to reject Holy Writ and thus lay themselves open to the threat of their Jesus' dearly beloved Hell.

Slavery, for example, is still a live issue (it is a way of life in Pakistan and many other Islamic lands, as well as in areas of India), and in seconds we can prove New Testament support for that venerable institution. There are many references, but Titus 2:9-10 is a goodie: 'Bid slaves to be submissive to their masters and to give satisfaction in every respect; they are not to be refractory, nor to pilfer, but to show entire and true fidelity, so that in everything they may adorn the doctrine of God.'

We might also use Mr. McKinsey's work to help those homosexuals who imagine - who pathetically insist - that there is a place for them in the Church. Again, there are several references, but the unequivocal Leviticus 20:13 is probably the most effective, for it specifically states that any male who lies with another male as with a woman has committed an abomination and should be killed. So - how can gays who give natural expression to their feelings be valid priests, ... 'marry' in church, ... legitimately take Communion?

And what of those sad women who labor under the illusion that they are valid priests (even bishops!) of the Church? Paul is, of course, notorious for his order that 'women keep silent in the churches, for it is not permitted them to speak,' and Peter insisted: 'Likewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands.'

Most non-RC Christians are sniffy about the Vatican's ban on divorce, but Rome's stand is entirely biblical. Protestants - not excluding our at-it-like-knives Royals - should note what Jesus says in Luke 16:18: 'Whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, commiteth adultery: and whosoever marrieth her that is put away from her husband commiteth adultery.'

Think of a subject, and it's there: long hair (men can't have it: 1 Cor. 11:14); planning for the future (don't do it: Matt. 6:25-34), and the pious Mr. Blair's family values: *'If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple'--*Luke 14:26.

God's cruelties are cataloged - 'Slay utterly old and young, both maids and little children, and women' Ezek. 9:6 - and we have the many, many biblical contradictions: was the color of Our Lord's crucifixion robe scarlet (Matthew) or purple (Mark and John)? A small matter? Not really - for, as the conservative Christian Professor Ryrice avers, 'any error opens the Bible to suspicion on other points that may not be so minor'

Some Humanists believe that the war for which this Encyclopedia provides such excellent ordnance has been won. They must be deceiving themselves over the number of believing Christians in the world - and, sadly, some are so intellectually dishonest as to collude with the liberal superstitionists by allowing them to snatch the less corrupt vegetables from the bag of nastiness.

Do, please, get this Encyclopedia. It is obtainable on order from all book shops: ISBN 0-87975-926-7. In case of difficulty, contact Prometheus UK at 10 Crescent View, Loughton, Essex IG I 0 4PZ (telephone 0 1 81 5082989). Certainly your public library should be asked to order a copy. (It can also be obtained at our address on page 6 for $52.20--Ed.).

All the big issues are dealt with - the false science of the Scriptures ... the empty prophecies ... the foolishness surrounding the alleged life, death, and resurrection of Jesus ... all are taken apart, with the Bible itself as the principal tool of destruction. Equally fascinating are the smaller, sharper barbs: Matthew 13:31-32 (RSV) says: 'The kingdom of heaven is like a grain of mustard seed which ... is the smallest of all seeds, but when it has grown is the greatest of shrubs and becomes a tree.' In fact, as Mr. McKinsey points out: "The mustard seed is not only not the smallest of all seeds, because the orchid seed, for example, is much smaller, but young trees are not shrubs and shrubs don't grow into trees. You would have expected the Creator of all things to have known that."

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #722 from CK of New Jersey (Part a)

Dear Dennis. As mentioned in the past, I think it behooves us who criticize the absurdities found in the Bible to be accurate in our own statements of fact, lest we be dismissed as ignorant ourselves. A couple of points come up in regard to issue 173: You say that "any reasonably informed liberal knows that virgin births are not only possible but quite common." While in vitro fertilization and artificial insemination certainly allow for virgin births, one wonders how common they are. Of course, you may have a different definition, but I would think that a "virgin birth" can only be one in which the mother is a virgin, that is, NEVER had sex, rather than merely that this pregnancy was not the result of sex. I would think that most women who go through the high-tech stuff had tried the normal way to become pregnant, and when this failed, went the high-tech route. Even if this is not the case, I don't imagine a large percentage of the population remaining virgins in any case. The Biblicists will also raise an uproar over the fact that it would be a miracle if 2000 years ago a virgin birth took place, lacking today's technology.

Editors Response to Letter #722 (Part a)

Dear CK. Your conception of this matter takes us back to the point I raised in an issue long ago. What is a Virgin Birth? To you it can only mean a birth emanating from one who has never engaged in coitus. To me it means a birth emanating from one who did not engage in coitus at the time, although that person may have engaged in coitus previously. With respect to the birth at issue, it was virginal. Under your definition what would you call a birth emanating from a prostitute who had no contact with a male in the instance being considered. To you that is not a virgin birth, while to me it is. The birth was virginal, even if the person yielding the baby was not. We are talking about a virgin birth, not a birth from a virgin. It is the birth that matters, not the person yielding the birth. Remember, its known as the Virgin Birth, not the Virgin Conceiver.

Second you say, "I would think that most women who go through the high-tech stuff had tried the normal way to become pregnant, and when this failed, went the high-tech route. Even if this is not the case, I don't imagine a large percentage of the population remaining virgins in any case." We are not dealing in percentages. If virgin births are physically and scientifically possible, then they are not miracles.

Third, you say, "Biblicists will also raise an uproar over the fact that it would be a miracle if 2000 years ago a virgin birth took place, lacking today's technology." What people thought then or think now is immaterial. The fact is that a virgin birth is not a miracle because it does not violate any scientific laws. Thousands of years ago people thought an eclipse was a miracle and according to your thinking it must have been because that is the way they perceived it.

Letter #722 Concludes (Part b)

More substantive: As a nonscientist you should not have a "high degree of confidence that if the centrifugal force caused by the earth's rotation at approximately 1,000 miles an hour were to cease, the results would be incalculable and result in the death of virtually every living organism on the planet. The power of gravity would take quantum leaps, causing every living thing to be pulled downward with horrendous force." No such thing would happen, as evidenced by the fact that people can travel to the north or south pole, where there is no centrifugal counteraction to gravity. At that point people don't collapse to the ground. The rotation of the earth there is merely like being on a turntable rotating at 1 rev per day. People weigh under an ounce more at the poles than at the equator. Of course if the Earth stopped rotating all of a sudden, by some miraculous intervention that affected only the solid body of the earth, then anything not fastened down would indeed find itself shooting eastward at 1000 miles per hour at the equator relative to the earth's surface, or over 700 miles per hour at the latitudes of the 48-states, not to mention the 1000 mile-per-hour (or 700-mph at our latitudes) winds. But gravity would not be hugely increased nor would huge downward pressures result.

Editors Response to Letter #722 (Part b)

We have been contacted by several people who appear to be well informed on this topic judging by the number of computations, equations, and statistics accompanying their depiction of the physics involved. They assure me, and have provided sufficient information to confirm their assertion, that there would be no appreciable increase in gravity if the earth were to cease rotating and all centrifugal force ended as well. Not being a physicist I will defer to their judgment and write off the source from which I obtained the idea that the results would be dramatic as ill-informed. This is purely a scientific question and I am more than willing to accept whatever informed scientists conclude. Your simple but poignant reference to what does not happen at the North Pole is enough to convince me that although the earth is rotating at 1,000 miles per hour its not as important as I thought because of the sheer magnitude of the planet.

There are times to hold them and times to fold them and this issue belongs in the latter category as far as I am concerned. Anyone who lets his ego supersede compelling evidence and good judgment is guilty of the very shortcoming we so often attribute to biblicists. The only person who never errs verbally is one who never speaks at all. I remember quite well my voice of the turtle faux pas many years ago in which I interpreted the word turtle as referring to the reptile rather than a turtle dove. As I have said before, I may not be perfect, but I'm light years ahead of my opposition.

Letter #723 from JS of Grosse Pointe Farms, Michigan (Part a)

Dear Dennis: Letters #707 (Issue #170) and #371 (Issue #90) are probably my two most favorite letters ever to have appeared in BE. Both letters compliment you on your exquisite logic and on your role as a model thinker for others. I love BE precisely because I have always believed such letters to be true. For instance, your remarks over the years about the likes of Madalyn O'Hair "prove" to me that you are above petty, cliquish politics and "tell it like it is" no matter whom you might offend. I admire that.

How utterly disappointed and depressed I am, therefore, at your response to my own Letter #709 (Issue #170). I stated that Unitarians believe whatever they want to and expend enormous amounts of energy justifying their beliefs. Your response was lame when you said many Unitarians "are not going to be very happy with your comparison between them and fundamentalist Christians"! No kidding. But so what? Does this now suggest that Dennis McKinsey is afraid of offending the Unitarians?

Dear JS. I don't see how my response can be considered lame, when all I was doing was relating what I think the Unitarian view of your reply would be. How is that lame? That is probably how they would feel if you equated them to fundamentalists.

You say, "Does this now suggest that Dennis McKinsey is afraid of offending the Unitarians?" I didn't say anything in regard to the Unitarians one way or the other. How did I get drawn into this? Sounds like you are trying to get me to criticize the Unitarians for something or other and attacking me for timidity if I don't.

Letter #723 Continues (Part b)

I want you to state, on the record, what you think of Unitarians. A few months ago, their national magazine carried an article asserting that people should believe whatever is "useful" to them emotionally. People should believe whatever helps them get through the day. Unitarian preachers quote from the Bible regularly, picking out those parts that appeal to them, and ever-so-piously "explaining" those parts that do not. And funny thing, a lot of the "bad" portions of the Bible (such as Matthew 5s "turn the other cheek," which Thomas Paine derides in Part II of The Age of Reason) the Unitarians preach as appropriate modes of conduct!

Editors Response to Letter #723 (Part b)

As was stated some time ago, particular denominations are not a concern of ours, since their positions vary so widely, and few churchgoers have a wider variance of internal beliefs than the Unitarians. They range all over the spectrum. If we proceed to critique their beliefs and behavior, we might as well focus on the others as well. And that is not what biblical criticism in general and BE in particular is all about.

Letter #723 Concludes (Part c)

A new book, just published by Beacon Press (their publishing arm), teaches children about "all the creation myths of the world, including the "scientific" myth of the big bang. An advertisement for the book says that each myth is "true" in the appropriate circumstance. For example, in church the religious myths are "true," but in school the scientific myths are "true." And no myth is inherently superior to any other. To assert one over the other would be arrogant!

To be totally honest with you, Dennis, I have had an easier time reasoning (Isaiah 1:18) with fundamentalist Christians than I have had with Unitarians. The Unitarians are, in my opinion, messed up in their brains. They deny the validity of logic itself, whereas fundamentalists (with a few exceptions) think logically. The fundamentalists merely ignore evidence which would, logically, lead to conclusions they dislike. The Unitarians are the flip-side of the fundamentalists: they accept all the evidence (they preach from science books equally as often as the Bible, the Mishnah, etc.), but they refuse to accept the conclusions to which the evidence logically leads!

I think BE should take a bold stand against all unreasonableness, not just that of fundamentalist Christians.

Editors Concluding Response to Letter #723 (Part c)

Are you sure you want to say Fundamentalists (with a few exceptions) think logically? I have no doubt some of our readers will take exception to that observation, JS. Although I certainly agree with your last sentence, we should still stay reasonably close to the Bible, since that's our primary area of interest.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #724 from KF of Lancaster, Pennsylvania

This is my Easter Message. I am sorry to inform all of you gullible Christians, that despite what preachers, popes, and pastors have been yammering about for years, Jesus Christ is still dead and buried, and Christianity is a fraud.

Jesus, of course, was said to be the "Lord" and most every Christian believes this still. Jesus said, "For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly; so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Matt 12:40). Jesus could not have lied, because Christians insist he was sinless and lying is a sin. But, unfortunately, both he and the church forgot that according to biblical truth, a day to the Lord is 1000 years. As 2 Peter 3:8 says, "But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." When Jesus said he would be in the heart of the earth for 3 days, he meant it. And since 3 days is 3000 years to the Lord, he's still there. Happy Easter!

Editors Response to Letter #724

I see you are operating on the premise that if biblicists can repeatedly use 2 Peter 3:8 to expediently escape from a dilemma, you can use it to create one. Interesting point! Touché!

Letter #725 from RH of Dayton, Ohio

On my Dayton Freenet Chat board, there is a young man, Michael, who usually posts "Today's Bible Verse," to which I try to respond if there is a reason to believe the verse needs clarification from a nonbeliever's point of view. Here is an example of this sort of exchange.

One of my constant themes on the chat board is that hell represents a great moral void in New Testament teachings, so I was recently surprised to see Michael post as "Today's Bible Verse," Matthew 18:34-35 which says, "Then in anger his master handed him over to the torturers until he should pay back the whole debt. So will my heavenly Father do to you, unless each of you forgives his brother from his heart."

To this I replied,

Jesus here speaks about how the master of the story makes a "just" punishment and yet Jesus doesn't condemn the master. The method is torture! Does Jesus speak out against this form of discipline? Not at all! He tells us that his heavenly father is going to torture those who are not able to forgive. Maybe I am interpreting too much here, but I suspect any god like the one in the Bible is going to develop tortures much deeper and more heinous than any human slave master.

Moreover, it does not end there! I do not think people should be tortured for mistreating other people (Jesus here shows that he disagrees with me). I do not think people should be tortured for failing to forgive one another (Jesus is saying the god of the Bible disagrees with me).

In fact, I think torture is never right. I don't care if it does have Biblical support. Any god who thinks it is dandy to torture other creatures is not entitled to belief by me.

Even if one forgives others, but still has the "wrong" religion, he gets tortured forever. Live a good life? Very nice. Forgive your neighbors? OK, that's good too. But you were raised in the Muslim faith? Eternal torture for you, pal. This system is based on ancient human ideas of vengeance and cruelty. It stinks.

I have been making this sort of argument for months and inviting people to tell me their views on torture in hell. (One liberal Christian did say she didn't believe the hell parts of the Bible.)

After a day of silence following my above post, I wrote the following message:

Well, I am a little disappointed in my Biblicist chat board friends, but I am not surprised that no one wanted to discuss yesterday's verses. There was vigorous discussion back and forth the day before, with good clarity and good will (at least from the pro-Bible side), on the issue of how well or poorly Jesus got along with his mom and pop. But this is, I think even my loyal opponents will agree, a minor topic when compared with the one ignored yesterday, which has to do with what the Bible's god has arranged for the dead. In the verses posted by Michael, Jesus seems to accept the use of torture on earth and support the torture his father has arranged in the hereafter.

I have heard from other discussants about how hell is not really going to be a blazing place and how we all have the opportunity to avoid it. I understand that this is a topic that makes some believers feel uncomfortable, especially in view of the uncompromising tone of the verses Michael supplied us with yesterday. (Once again, Michael, you have my thanks for your work.) It is obvious from those verses that Jesus wants us to know that the Bible's god thinks that torturing some people after death is just the way to handle things. The conclusion that this is so and the connected conclusion, which I drew, that those who believe in the "wrong" faith are to be among the tortured is also inescapable, if you accept the Bible as true.

So, by your silence, my friends, are you showing your support for such a system of torture? I know that none of you would torture anyone yourself, and that you would recommend that I and everyone believing religions other than yours should reform, adopt Christianity, and thus avoid the torture which your Bible says is in store for us if we do not. I take all this for granted, and I thank you heartily for your good will. But do you feel that the god described in the Bible, who is supposed to be just and loving, would set up a system of torture for any reason? Torture for having the wrong religion? What comfort is there for you in holding this idea? I assume that you do not see yourselves as liable for torture, but you only feel you are going to gain infinite happiness. But how will you ever be able to be infinitely happy if you know such a cruel system has barbarically been imposed on others simply because they believed the wrong way? The system sounds disgusting to me. Doesn't it disgust you?

I am not at all saying that your silence indicates consent with my ideas; indeed, I will completely understand if the enormity of the injustice (at least, I see it as an injustice) reflected in this system makes it impossible to discuss it with me. If you would rather not address this, I can understand why. I think, quite frankly, it is the strongest argument I have against the metaphysics and the eschatology proclaimed by the Bible. In my opinion, any god who plans the torture of humans, for any reason, is no god but a monster. Such a "god" is the product of ancient ignorance and cruelty, unworthy of belief from modern thinking humans. I am glad that there is no scientific evidence that such a thing exists. I do not know how those whose faith tells them it does exist can find this sort of monster to be a comfort.

A few days after saying this I received some verses assuring me that God is love, and so on, But in my opinion they had little to do with the moral problem posed by a god who arranges torture for humans.

Letter #726 from GN of Scottsdale, Arizona

I received your latest newsletter today and I think there is a scripture that states Jesus was "tempted in all things." However, the part about experiencing the "whole gamut of Satan testing" is an addition. (Hebrews 4:15). One might assume that if Jesus was tempted in all things that he endured the whole gamut of Satan testing, but the whole idea is absurd anyway. Jesus was not married; therefore, he could not have been tempted in the way of adultery, or have been tempted to commit spousal abuse. He did not have children; therefore, he did not face the temptation of incest or child abuse. He did not live to an old age or suffer the aches and pains that would tempt him in the way of euthanasia. He was not born in poverty; therefore, he was not tempted to steal. Since he was supposedly an only child, he would not have been tempted to sibling jealousy and perhaps even hatred. There is not one shred of evidence that Jesus was tempted in "all" ways. How about drug abuse? Abortion?

Thanks for all your information over the years. I love every issue.

Editors Response to Letter #726

Dear GN. You say, "I think there is a scripture that states Jesus was 'tempted in all things'" which is an accurate reference to Heb. 4:15 ("but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin"). But I interpreted that as meaning the Bible actually related instances of Jesus being tempted in everything while I am aware of little in this regard.

Although I agree with the general thrust of your argument, GN, you might want to modify or replace a few of your points. Jesus did have siblings according to some verses in the gospels (Matt. 13:55, Mark 6:3) and some would say you do not have to be married to be an adulterer. As long as one of the parties involved is married that is sufficient. And his birth in a manger allegedly among animals would imply being born into poverty to some.

But be that as it may, the central thrust of your message remains valid. There is no way Jesus could have been tempted in all things. As you say, he couldn't very well have been tempted to beat his wife when he had none.

Letter #727 from JK of Lynn, Indiana

Hi Dennis. Enclosed is the March issue of Biblical Errancy. I sent it to you to show you the condition of it when I received it. (The issue was torn up and tracked over pretty bad.--Ed). This is not the first time that this kind of thing has happened. Several weeks ago I received a post card and someone peeled a layer right across the message on the card so that it could not be deciphered. It appears to me that there is some sort of brain-damaged fundamentalist who has access to the Post Office mail room and when any mail that's not oriented to his mind-warped religion comes by, he attempts to destroy it. None of the junk mail that I have received so far has had so much as a bent corner, but mail from you and several others that I receive that appear to be anti-Christian seems to get damaged in some way. Now, you might say that I should report this type of vandalism to the Post Office. I have tried that gimmick and you either get a brush off or they give you a bunch of forms to fill out, and that's the last you hear of it. If you follow up on it, they will tell you it's still under investigation and eventually the complaint fades away into the wind. Usually your newsletter arrives between the 5th or 10th of the month, but this one arrived on the 25th. The others arrive anywhere from 10 to 15 days late also, so I surmise that there must be a skunk in the wood pile, to use an apt phrase. But maybe I'm insulting a poor defenseless animal so I apologize to the skunk. I would appreciate it if you would send me a replacement and should there be a charge let me know and I will reimburse the cost. Thank you.

Editors Response to Letter #727

Dear JK. I have had the same kind of experiences and feelings over the years but nothing has been definitely proven. So I have been compelled to reluctantly accept whatever occurs. There really isn't much you can do other than filling out some forms which seem to accomplish little or nothing. I don't know if I am being sabotaged, some equipment malfunctioned, or someone just goofed, and I can't remember ever having received a definitive reply. Some postal employees did manage to retrieve one of two lost tapes several years ago; however, I recently sent a video tape to New York for viewing by a prominent anti-religious organization and all I got back from the post office was its shredded wrapper and some apologies with the usual forms to complete.

As far as your personal plight is concerned, we will certainly send you a replacement at no charge with our condolences. Having been in the same predicament I know how you feel. But, unfortunately, there is nothing I can do. My position is no more secure than yours. About the only thing we can both do is grin and bear it, while carrying on.

Letter #728 from LR of Toledo, Ohio

Dear Dennis McKinsey. After reading your thought-provoking, stimulating and wonderful publication, I have decided to subscribe immediately, for the intelligence and perception that you offer to one who, long ago, gave up on supernatural beliefs in spooks, angels, demons, and apocalyptic gobbledygook.

Issue #175 July 1997, Editor: Dennis McKinsey

A national periodical focusing on Biblical errors, contradictions, and fallacies, while providing a hearing for apologists

COMMENTARY

This months issue will open, as did last months, with a review of our Encyclopedia by an editor with his own publication followed by letters from our readers.

REVIEW

One of our long-term subscribers, RH, sent us the following message written by a fundamentalist who publishes a small but thick periodical entitled The Tentmaker and with whom I have had lengthy telephone conversations. RH prefaced his letter to me by saying, I found a relatively complimentary review of your book on a Biblicist's web page. Maybe people will buy by his recommendation! (The highly religious author of the message said,--Ed.)

"The first two books we will briefly talk about come from the publisher Prometheus Books. This company specializes in books most Christians would categorize as 'secular humanist'.... I have read some of the books from their catalog. I have discovered that many of those writing for this publisher have been deeply burned by the Christian religion. Much of what they write against Christianity is true! They expose many of the charismatic faith healers as frauds. Randy the Magician, exposed Peter Popoff by showing his so-called word of knowledge was nothing more than a radio receiver implanted in his ear. Gerard Straub, a former producer for the 700 Club reveals what life is like in this evangelical empire. There are several books on the subject of the horrors perpetrated upon mankind by the institution of religion. Several books deal with the subject of the Bible, its contradictions, errors, and its ill effects upon reasonable people. I am probably going to get some flack from some Christians for what I am about to recommend. So be it. Much of what these writers have to say about the church past and present is true. These writers have looked at church history and many have participated as active members in mainstream churches and walked away disgusted or hurt. We should have a heart to hear their cry. We should have the willingness to correct those things clearly wrong, and most of all, we should be humble enough to admit when we are wrong and change. But when I was in the mainstream church, we read books by so-called cult experts who would read these books for us so that we could know what they believe without getting our little minds dirty. These cult expert writers and ministries will one day be exposed for being cults themselves! It is time for us to grow up. We must be accountable for our own actions, and we must see if these things be so ourselves.

The books I am reviewing from Prometheus Books are entitled The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy by C. Dennis McKinsey and The Bad News Bible by David Voas.

These two books are new additions to the several books Prometheus Books publishes which are aimed at discrediting the Bible as the word of God. Now, listen to me very carefully, especially those of the fundamentalist persuasion. Don't twist my words. Hear my heart. There are some in our readership that should go to the library and check out these books if available. There are some of you who should purchase these books, read them, and wrestle with the contents until you can give a reasonable explanation or answer to the things contained in these books. You should then minister to these people in love showing them where they are correct and incorrect. The trouble with this is that most Christians do not know the Bible or church history well enough to do so. I am not exaggerating when I say that many of these anti-Bible books writers know the Scriptures better than most pastors.

The Bad News Bible is written from a fictional viewpoint of Jesus' brother James. James, when he is through commenting on what is today incorrectly called the 'New Testament,' shows that the words of Jesus (or his ghostwriters) specifically deny much of Sunday School theology, and only the most selective quotations can give anyone confidence in salvation. Jesus doesn't live up to the Good Shepherd reputation. The promise of a heavenly afterlife comes from Paul, whose views on sex, women, and the family do little for his credibility. Judgment Day could come at any moment. While David Voas is very incorrect about who Jesus Christ is, he makes some very keen observations about much of what is taught as Biblical truths which are nothing but the traditions of men.

The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy was written by a high school counselor (a position I have not held for many years--Ed.). He has appeared on many radio and television programs in debates. McKinsey 'thinks the Bible is a deceptively inaccurate conglomeration of mythology and folklore masquerading as a valid picture of historical reality.' According to the publishers the book 'vividly proves the Bible to be its own worst enemy.'

I have been in correspondence with Mr. McKinsey over the last few months and I would like to make a few comments. This man knows the Bible as well as any fundamentalist preacher, probably better. He certainly knows church history better. One night we spent over 2 hours debating over the telephone on my nickel, or should I say on some of those nickels some of you have sent in. (Thanks) He has combed the Bible very thoroughly. Let me tell you; those of you who really want to be able to share scripturally the hope within you, who want to truly understand the scriptures, who want to test your faith without hiding your head in the sand should purchase this book and spend several weeks wrestling with some of the points he makes. My heart goes out to this man and to many like him who have not received good answers from Christians. Shut off the TV and get knowledgeable enough about the things of God to be able to talk to this man and millions like him who are not satisfied with lazy superficial answers!

The famous atheist, Bertrand Russell, rejected Christianity not because it was not true, but because he read the Bible through the eyes of modern traditional teaching. The orthodox view of things does make the Bible contradict itself in many ways. We need to acknowledge our errors. We need to fess up about our faulty 'inerrancy' doctrine and admit our English translations are not as pure as we have said they were. In short, we need to get honest. I believe when we do, people like David Voas and Dennis McKinsey will see the light and will be a very valuable part of the body of Christ. While both books are overpriced, (as are many Christian books) I recommend those who are not afraid to have their foundations tested or who have a heart to reach those who can argue and reason well, to purchase these books, especially McKinsey's. They will greatly sharpen your skills and probably rearrange some of your theological furniture. It is time to put off our stupidity and put on the mind of Christ. These books will force you to press much deeper than perhaps you have in the past. To order, call or write: Prometheus Books 59 John Glenn Dr. Amherst, New York 14228 1-800-421-0351 Bad News Bible-$25.95; The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy-$49.95 (or contact me at my address on page 6--Ed.).

We appreciate the considerate observations from the author of The Tentmaker and only wish more biblicists were as forthright and perceptive. I would, however, enter a significant caveat. There is a far greater possibility of Christians seeing the fraudulent nature of the Bible and coming to their senses than me "seeing the light" and "becoming part of the body of Christ," especially in view of the fact that the Bible and Jesus have little light to shed.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #729 from NB of Tucson, Arizona

Dear Dennis. Regarding your reply to Ken Bonnell (BE #169, page 4), you say that you were correct in asserting "defraud not" is not a commandment.... But Jesus doesn't say "the ten commandments. Indeed, he omits the commandments" about "graven images," taking the Lords name in vain, and coveting. Are we then free to disregard those just because Jesus didn't mention them?

In the OT outside of the Torah, the word "commandment(s)" is found only in Psalm 119, and there four times (verses 73, 127, 143, and 151), referring to Gods commandments. Esther is the only book in the Bible that doesn't once mention the name of God. Verse 3:3 refers to "the kings commandment." If you know of any version in which Jesus specifically says the "ten Commandments," please cite it.

Editors Response to Letter #729

Dear NB. Don't you do any research before firing off a letter? Apparently not! Not only are some of your comments erroneous but I am having difficulty even seeing the relevance of others.

First, you say "In the OT outside of the Torah, the word 'commandment(s)' is found only in Psalm 119, and there four times (verses 73, 127, 143, and 151), referring to Gods commandments." Did you make any attempt whatever to check this out? Obviously not, for if you had gone to page 210 in Strongs Exhaustive Concordance, you would have seen literally scores of instances in which the word "commandments" is employed outside the Torah throughout the OT.

Second, you say "He omits the 'commandments' about 'graven images,' taking the Lords name in vain, and coveting. Are we then free to disregard those just because Jesus didn't mention them?" Who said anything about disregarding anything? That's not even the issue. Our basic disagreement is one of determining whether or not Jesus was referring to the "Ten Commandments" when he included "Defraud not" in a list of commandments. You say he was not, while I say he was. I said in the January issue and will repeat again, "In Mark 10:19 and Matt. 19:18-19 Jesus lists the commands that were written on stone and are specifically referred to as the Ten Commandments in Ex. 34:28, Deut. 4:13, and Deut. 10:4. So we are only talking about THE Ten Commandments, not commandments in general."

Third, how is the fact that the Book of Esther does not mention the name of God even relevant to what we are discussing?

Fourth, are you saying Jesus was referring to OT commandments in general when he said "Thou knowest the commandments?" If so, then why did he start listing those in Exodus 20 and Deut. 5 which are associated with the Ten Commandments?

Fifth, why did he start listing them at all, since he would have had to enumerate over 600 commandments?

Sixth, why would he say "thou knowest the commandments" when he was referring to over 600 rather than 10? Do you think he actually expected the person to whom he was talking to know more than 600 statutes?

Seventh, just because he failed to list 5 of the ten does not mean he was not referring to what people regard as the Ten Commandments. Are you saying he had to list them all in order for you to be convinced he was referring to the Ten Commandments?

And finally, according to you Jesus was not referring to the Ten Commandments in Mark 10 and Matt. 19. Both say "Do not commit adultery, do not kill, do not steal, do not bear false witness, and honor thy father and thy mother." Are you really trying to tell me we are not dealing with the Ten Commandments and Jesus was not referring to the Ten commandments? Who are you trying to delude? If Jesus was not referring to the Ten Commandments but only to some OT commandments in general, then would you be so kind as to give me a list of what you consider to be THE Ten Commandments and back it up with chapter and verse? Apparently you have a new list of THE Ten Commandments and I eagerly look forward to reading them, as, no doubt, does most of Christendom.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #730 from JN of Lancaster, Pennsylvania

Much earlier in this ongoing saga of Biblical errancy I presented some simple numerical problems found in the Bible. Here's another. In Ezra 2 (KJV) there is a long list of the number of people in the sub clans who returned from a captivity. The total is listed as 42,360, but when you add up the actual enumerated sub clans, the total is really 29,818. In comparison the same story in Nehemiah 7 also lists the total as 42,360, but when these are added up, the total is actually 31,089. This is yet another obvious example of a mathematical error in the Wholly Babble which cannot be dismissed by fundamentalist apologists. Regarding this problem a critic of mine on the Internet, RPHL, replied to me by citing Norman Geisler who said on page 214 in his book "When Critics Ask: A Popular Handbook of Biblical Difficulties."

"First, it is possible that each of these is a copyist error. One of the most problematic areas of transcription for the Jewish scribe was copying numbers. It is certainly conceivable that out of these rather large lists of names and numbers there would be a number of copyist errors."

I replied by saying that this is just a convenient assumption based on zero evidence. No "original" manuscripts are available with which to make a comparison with the copies. Moreover there is no problem in transcribing numbers for the Jewish scribes because, contrary to often heard assumptions, numbers were written out as words instead of numerical figures. The fact that contradictory numbers exist in the copies is strong evidence that the originals had them too. I can see contradictions in the copies, but you cant see the originals. I have positive evidence; Geisler has none.

Moreover, apologists brag that there was extreme fidelity in the copying of "scripture" citing, for example, the ancient manuscripts of Isaiah found among the Dead Sea Scrolls. But when challenged with actual discrepancies and errors in various texts, these same apologists blurt out, "problematic areas" and "copyist errors."

RPHL continued to quote Geisler who says, "Second, it is also possible that Ezra and Nehemiah compiled their lists at different times. Ezra may have compiled a list of those who left Babylon with Zerubbabel, while Nehemiah compiled his list of those who actually made it to Jerusalem."

I told the desperate RPHL that he was resorting to BLATANT LYING about the text by quoting Geisler. (Is anybody surprised?) Here's what Ezra and Nehemiah ACTUALLY say: Ezra 2:1 says, "Now these are the people of the province who came up from the captivity of the exiles, whom Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon had taken captive to Babylon (they returned to Jerusalem and Judah, each to his own town..." Neh. 7:6 says,..."These are the people of the province who came up from the captivity of the exiles whom Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon had taken captive (they returned to Jerusalem and Judah, each to his own town..."

The language is practically identical. BOTH say "these are the people...who came up..." BOTH say nothing whatever about those "who left" or those "who actually made it." I told RPHL that he was INVENTING a text, a sin!

If one reads further, BOTH texts, not just Ezra, mention the people leaving Babylon with Zerubbabel. I told RPHL that he was resorting to a misleading statement, incomplete facts, and frank LYING.

RPHL said, "In some cases, people who left Babylon with the intention of going back to rebuild Jerusalem may have turned back or died along the way. In other cases, a family may have enlisted recruits to bolster their numbers. Perhaps family members in other lands got word of the migration and rendezvoused with their relatives along the way from Babylon to Jerusalem."

To this I said, you and Geisler are idiots as well as liars. Ezra and Nehemiah BOTH HAVE THE SAME TOTALS, so even if they are writing at different times, which is not true as I explained above, IT CANNOT EXPLAIN THE ERROR WHICH CONSISTS OF THE SUBTOTALS NOT ADDING UP TO THE TOTALS GIVEN!!! The error consists in Ezra and Nehemiah's ADDITIONS. It doesn't make any difference as to WHEN they did their estimates.

For your benefit, I'll repeat the mistakes to you and EXPLAIN the mistakes which you and Geisler FAILED to see: In Ezra 2 there is a long list of the number of people in the sub clans who returned from a captivity. The total is listed as 42,360 (Ezra 2:64-"The whole company numbered 42,360" --NIV), but when you add up the actual enumerated listed sub clans of the whole company, the total is really 29,818. There is a shortage of 12,542 (42,360 minus 29,818).

In comparison, the same story in Nehemiah 7 lists the same total, 42,360, (Nehemiah 7:66-"The whole company numbered 42,360" --NIV), but when the enumerated sub clans of the whole company are added up, the total is actually 31,089. There is a shortage of 11,271 (42,360 minus 31,089).

RPHL replied that if one takes the time to study how Hebrew numbers were written by ancient scribes, it is easy to see how copying errors could have crept into the text.

I said those numbers were written out as words, viz, forty two thousand, three hundred and sixty, NOT 42,360. So it's NOT easy to see how a copyist error was made.

RPHL said in reply, "The appearance of numerical copying errors does not falsify the inspiration of the Bible, or prove that it is unworthy or unreliable in what it teaches concerning spiritual matters. Critics such as you fatally assume that since there are copying errors in the manuscript copy, there are errors in the original as well."

To this I said, "It's YOU who are fatally ASSUMING that the originals are error free when not only do you NOT have any evidence for it (you have no originals) but you have NEGATIVE EVIDENCE for it in the form of the copies that are available for all to inspect. In contrast I have POSITIVE EVIDENCE for my position that the Bible is ERRANT because I have written texts in front of me that DO CONTAIN NUMEROUS ERRORS, not only in numerical instances but in nearly every other sphere of discourse--scientific, social, political, and theological.

It is well known that most if not all human documents contain errors of one sort or another. It is unusual for a writing, particularly a writing as long as the Bible to contain absolutely no errors whatsoever. That would be an unusual or extraordinary condition. THE ONUS OF PROOF IS ON THE PERSON CLAIMING THE EXTRAORDINARY. Yet, you have zero evidence for your position.

The principle of falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus (false in one thing, false in everything) is certainly applicable to the errors under discussion. This rule of evidence recognizes that testimony found to be false in one matter should be considered unreliable in other matters. If you insist the claim of inerrancy is true, then please come up with a truly inerrant Bible. As far as I know, no such item has ever been published.

RPHL replied by saying, "Inspiration does not guarantee that every copy of the original is without error. We can expect minor errors to make their way into copies."

My response was that this whole idea of inspiration only in the originals but not the copies is frankly stupid. Not only is it stupid--it is really an ad hoc alibi on the part of inerrantists because they have no EVIDENCE whatsoever to support their idiotic claim.

Imagine: The almighty "God" dictates his "word" to ancient shepherders while ensuring it is written down precisely and correctly, and then goes on vacation or dozes off, forgetting to ensure that the copies are precise and correct too. He is supposed to be OMNIPOTENT, meaning he can do ANYTHING, in which case it should be EASY for him to ensure good copies. But he doesn't. God is supposed to be GOOD also. It would be GOOD for him to make sure all humans get his holy word intact. But he fails at this task too.

How utterly silly and stupid. You, RPHL, and Geisler are wasting your lives at this pathetic enterprise!

RPHL then said, "Minor errors do not change the meaning of the text, or the spiritual message behind it."

To that I said, "Now you are suggesting there ARE errors in the original, but they don't make any difference. Your little charade is exposed...."

We can EASILY detect errors in mathematics because the rules of math are precise and errors of addition, for example, like those we are discussing here, are OBJECTIVELY quite noticeable. The same goes for scientific errors....

The alleged almighty good "God" has utterly failed at his job of transmitting his intentions to his creation.

RPHL concluded by saying, "If you received a letter in the mail that you had won a sweepstakes, and the sentence saying-"OU HAVE WON THE FIVE MILLION DOLLAR READER'S DIGEST SWEEPSTAKES"-had one typo would you be able to understand the sentence? Of course. And if you received another letter the next day with another typo-"Y#U HAVE WON THE FIVE MILLION DOLLAR READER'S DIGEST SWEEPSTAKES,"-you'd be even more sure, despite the minor typo. It is the same with minor errors in the bible... the manuscripts may be imperfect in their copies, but they contain the complete truth of the original Word of God. This complete truth is the message of salvation through Jesus Christ.

And I concluded by telling RPHL that he had to get this little tag line in at the end in order to assure a brownie point or two from his almighty imaginary guru. The sweepstakes analogy fails because we KNOW what sweepstakes letters are like, having numerous ORIGINALS of them with which comparisons can be made. As I told him earlier, he has NO ORIGINALS of the Bible and in that regard he is just whistling in the dark.

Letter #731 from M.J of Andover, Mass.

(The March, April and May issues had 3 parts of a lengthy article by MJ in which he explained why he was not a liberal Christian and why he supported a deistic philosophy very similar to that propounded by Thomas Paine--Ed.).

Dear Dennis. The middle section of my essay/letter "Why I Am Not a Liberal Christian" is a description of the liberal position, a position I tentatively held at that phase of my philosophical journey. I trust that the last part of the essay makes it perfectly clear that I do not hold that position today. I intentionally structured the essay in that way, presenting the liberal position in an ostensibly positive light, in order to refute it in the last part of the essay. Your criticisms of that section are for the most part the same conclusions I eventually came to.

One comment I would make is that claiming "but that is what Jesus said," holds no water for liberal Christians. Their position is that one does not know just what Jesus actually said. The "Jesus Seminar" enterprise was all about that - liberal theologians voting on what he most likely actually said. The text is not sacred to liberals; the Bible is not a perfect book. To them it's a flawed account of man's relationship with God, and every individual has to interpret it, and pick and choose, according to his own lights. For me that liberal position initially seems plausible, IF "problem" passages are minor. But a fair-minded examination shows it's not just minor passages (that plague the Bible--Ed.); its major issues also (Jesus teaching Hell, Jesus teaching the end of the world in his generation, etc.). If the main thrust of Jesus' teaching can be discarded, ignored, or easily revised by liberals, then you do not have an honest endeavor. And, as I've said, liberals are just making up their own theology and religion. The Hollywood movie version of Jesus, with no scenes of Jesus thundering on about Hell, or praising eunuchs, or prohibiting remarriage, but only being Mr. Wonderful, is really the theology of the average liberal Christian. And the theology of the professional liberal Christians (ministers) is built on, as you say, "unscrupulous" interpretations under the guise of "sophisticated" hermeneutics.

P.S. I've had to take another detour from working directly on my tapes. I've been spending time reading, thinking, writing, about the existence of God, in general. I'm just about done with that. I'll send you a copy in a week or so. Best wishes.

Editors Response to Letter #731

Dear MJ. The tapes you send me get better and better with each group, as does your entire approach to interaction with religionists and biblicists. I would like to make a few observations with respect to your accurate comments regarding liberals.

First, you say the liberal position "is that one does not know just what Jesus actually said." I beg to differ with the liberals in this regard because all we know about what Jesus said is in scripture. Far be it from me to agree with the fundamentalists on much of anything, but their rejection of the general approach exhibited by those in what is known as the Jesus Seminar is justified. To the latter I would utter my old refrain: How do you know what is true once you begin to admit certain parts are false.

Second, this kind of a la carte approach to biblical research on the part of the Seminar participants is naturally going to gravitate toward expunging comments by Jesus that put Christianity in general and Jesus in particular in a bad light. There is a kind of sleight-of-hand from the other end of the spectrum. Instead of stoutly defending questionable, if not outlandish comments by Jesus, as is practiced by fundamentalists, participants in the Seminar have opted to either expunge, abandon, or radically reinterpret what is being said by Jesus.

Third, if votes by scholars are going to determine what Jesus did and did not say, then, in effect, only that part of the Bible approved by them is divinely inspired. That's only another way of saying man wrote the Bible rather than God. It's man's book, not God's. They are gratuitously rejecting manuscript evidence not in accord with their preferences and predilections.

And lastly, you say that according to the liberals every individual has to interpret it, and pick and choose, according to his own lights. If that is true, then you will have as many Bibles as you have readers, because one interpretation will be as valid as another. In any event, judging from the general tenor of your comments, I would say we have come to essentially the same conclusions.

Letter #732 from DS of Tustin, California

Dear Dennis....I get tired of being serious with the fundamentalists and most often try a little humor. In Matt. 9:13 and Mark 2:17 Jesus said, "those who are well have no need of a physician, but those who are sick do; I came not to call the righteous but the sinners." I tell them with a straight face that I don't have to believe in Jesus because he did not come for me. They always reply that he came to save all because we are all sinners. I quote the above to show that there must be some righteous or else Jesus wouldn't have mentioned them. I then say that I am one of the righteous and assert that if he came for them, they must be the sinners. That anyone could think that way usually leaves them stunned and I, in turn, have a big smile.

Letter #733 Via email from MKU

Your web site is by far the most remarkable commentary on the factual accuracy of the Bible I have ever seen..... and....it is unbelievably BIG. The material has genuine depth. In making this information easily available online, you are doing an immense service. Thank you.

Letter #734 from JW of Palm Springs, Florida

I don't believe in reincarnation but if there were such then Thomas Paine would reside at 2500 Punderson Drive in Ohio. Man, you are something else. I've read most of your last delivery of issues and cant put you down. So right, so comical, so on the money. You are a breath of fresh air. I wish my Father could have shared your philosophy. He passed away. Will write later.

Editors Response to Letter #734

Your compliments JW, like those of MKU, are most appreciated. Although there is an obvious self-serving aspect to all letters of this kind I can't help but feel a need to include them because they not only elevate my spirits but those of everyone sympathetic to our cause. Goodness knows, with the smothering influence of religious and biblical propaganda in this country, there is precious little else to improve our morale.

EDITOR'S NOTE:

(a) HEAR YE HEAR YE: Our old provider increased his rates and reduced even further the small number of newsgroups to which he furnished access. Consequently ON JULY 1, 1997, OUR NEW EMAIL ADDRESS WITH OUR NEW PROVIDER WILL BE: klomckin@infinet.com (all in lower case).

(b) We plan to complete our recording of 100 half hour TV programs by the end of this summer and so far we have received sufficient assistance from some unsung heroes to buy all of our original tapes from the station. However, we still need an additional $600 to purchase the sophisticated recorder that is needed to play and record from our better quality Super VHS originals. Any assistance that can be rendered by our readership in this regard would be greatly appreciated. The station has the option of recording over our originals any time they so choose and the sooner we obtain them the safer. We know the quality and clarity of the programs we distribute can be significantly improved with better equipment and better originals and the quicker this becomes operational the better. But the outlook in this regard remains in the hands of our supporters.

When it comes to critical issues of this nature I am reminded of an interesting story regarding four people named Everybody, Somebody, Anybody and Nobody. There was an important job to be done and Everybody was sure that Somebody would do it. Anybody could have done it, but Nobody did it. Somebody got angry about that, because it was Everybody's job. Everybody thought Anybody could do it, but Nobody realized that Everybody wouldn't do it. It ended up that Everybody blamed Somebody when Nobody did what Anybody could have done.

Unfortunately, when it comes to playing our programs on public access TV throughout the nation or rendering financial assistance, many, but not all, have chosen to remain on the sidelines. Hopefully those to whom this applies will now alter their philosophy and choose not only to participate but contribute.

COMMENTARY

This month's issue will begin with a review of an apologetic work produced by the collaborative work of three apologists followed by several pieces of correspondence from some of our readers.

REVIEW

In 1989 the televangelist, John Ankerberg, Dr. John Weldon, and Dr. Walter Kaiser, Professor of OT and Semitic languages at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, teamed up to publish a book entitled The Case of Jesus the Messiah. In which they sought to prove that Jesus fulfilled the OT messianic requirements. Although most of the work is the standard apologetic fare, some of the more egregious comments contained therein are worthy of comment and one would be remiss were they allowed to pass unchallenged.

First, on page 22 they quote Gen. 3:14-15 ("So the Lord God said to the serpent, Because you have done this... will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your seed and her seed. He will bruise your head, and you will bruise his head") and then say, "The context of this passage is the temptation and Fall of Adam and Eve by the deception of the 'serpent.' Who is the serpent? Revelation 12:9 (And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast with him) and Rev. 20:2 (And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years) identify him as the serpent of old, who is the devil or Satan. Yes, it says he is the serpent of old but nowhere does Revelation say it was the serpent who tempted Eve in Genesis. Our illustrious authors are engaged in one of the most subtle sleight-of-thought maneuvers endemic to Christian theology. Where does the Bible say that Eve was tempted by the Devil or Satan? It says she was tempted by a serpent; but nowhere does it say that serpent was the Devil or Satan. The words Devil and Satan never even appear in the Book of Genesis. In order to circumvent this major roadblock to Christian exegesis, these apologists latched onto the two passages just quoted from Revelation. But where does scripture equate the serpent in Gen. 3 with the serpent in Rev. 12 and 20? In order to keep the minds of critics off this major stumbling stone, the authors focus on a secondary issue by saying, "For those who accept only the Hebrew Scriptures as authoritative, the serpent in Genesis 3:14 cannot be just an animal. The serpent must be a person. The word 'enmity' in the Hebrew Scriptures always refers to hatred between persons. It is never used between an animal and a person." But whether the serpent in Gen. 3 is an animal or a person is of far less importance than whether or not the serpent in Revelation is the one who acted in Genesis. Just because the Bible talks about a serpent in Genesis and a serpent in Revelation and the latter is called the Devil, that old serpent, and Satan, does not mean they are identical. That leap in logic is textually unsupported. It has always been assumed by apologists that they are the same, but nowhere does the Bible clearly and unmistakably equate the two. That is a concession biblical critics would do well to abandon.

Second, on page 30 they contend that the messiah must come "from Bethlehem" according to Micah 5:2. But as we showed in our issues on prophecy, 1 Chron. 4:4 shows there is a far greater possibility of Bethlehem referring to an individual than a town because it says 'Bethlehem Ephratah.' Not only is Bethlehem the name of a man whose father is Ephratah but Micah 5:6 shows Micah is referring to someone who delivered people from the Assyrians, a group of people whose empire disappeared 600 years before Jesus was even born.

Third, in their pronounced attempt to set Moses and Jesus off from the crowd they state on page 32, "Until Jesus came, no one was superior to Moses, for it was only said of Moses and Jesus that they knew the Lord and spoke to Him 'face to face.'" (Deut. 34:10, Matt. 3:17, Mark 9:7, and others). If it was said, then it was said erroneously, because other biblical figures saw God as well.

It is interesting to note that our authors are only making this claim indirectly through the alleged claims of others because they are probably aware of the fact that Moses and Jesus are by no means the only ones who spoke to God face to face. In Job 42:5 Job said, "I have heard thee by the hearing of the ear: but now mine eye seeth thee." In Gen. 32:30 Jacob says, "I have seen God face to face and my life is preserved." Num. 14:14 says, "...they have heard that thou Lord art among this people, that thou Lord art seen face to face...." Isaiah 6:1 says, "In the year that king Uzziah died I saw also the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up...." Psalm 63:2 says, "To see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary." And in Amos 7:7-8 Amos says, "...the Lord stood upon a wall made by a plumb line, with a plumb line in his hand. And the Lord said unto me, Amos, what seest thou? And I said, A plumb line...." So obviously Moses and Jesus were not the only biblical figures to have seen God face to face.

Fourth, on page 32 the authors state, "The following parallels and contrasts will show that only Jesus completely fulfilled and went beyond Moses prophetic office and is the unique One God promised would come.... Moses was a great worker of miracles.... But Jesus did greater works than Moses." Then they quote Acts 2:22 which says, "Men of Israel, listen to these words: Jesus the Nazarene, a man attested to you by God with miracles and wonders and signs which God performed through Him in your midst...." Our authors failed to remember or are apparently unaware of the fact that the ability to do miracles does not prove one is from God, is God, or represents God. In fact, the Bible specifically states in Matt. 24:23-24 and Mark 13:21-22, "Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not. For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." Second Thess. 2:9

says, "Even him whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders...." And Rev. 16:14 says, "For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles...." In effect, miracles are not to be used to prove one is from God because false Christs, false prophets and even the devil can work miracles. Jesus himself says as much in Matt. 24:23-24.

Fifth, on page 38 they state, "When 'blood and water' came forth from Jesus pierced side (John 19:34), this was medical proof that His heart had literally burst fulfilling David's words, 'My heart has turned to wax. It has melted away within me'" (Psalm 22:14, 33:99, 96:129-147). This would be far more indicative of someone who has been stabbed in the side after having drunk a lot of water than one who was stabbed in the heart? Why would blood and water gush forth from a heart that burst? We can all understand a profuse amount of blood, but water is another matter.

Sixth, while discussing the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53 they state, "Who else but Jesus Christ ever claimed He was the Messiah?" One can only conclude that the training in religious history of our illustrious trio has been sadly neglected because anyone acquainted with messianism knows that hundreds have made this claim and many have been taken seriously.

Seventh, while trying to equate that same Suffering Servant with Jesus, the authors quote Matt. 27:12-14 ("When he was accused by the chief priests and the elders, he gave no answer. Then Pilate asked him, Don't you hear the testimony they are bringing against you? but Jesus made no reply, not even to a single charge--to the great amazement of the governor") and then they allege this is a fulfillment of Isa. 53:8 ("He was oppressed and afflicted, yet he did not open his mouth. he was led like a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before his shearers is silent, so he did not open his mouth"). The obvious problem with this rendition of what occurred is that Jesus not only opened his mouth and replied to his accusers but engaged in verbal repartee. John 18:33-37 says, "Then Pilate entered into the judgment hall again, and called Jesus, and said unto him. Art thou the King of the Jews? Jesus answered him, Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me? Pilate answered, Am I a Jew? Thine own nation and the chief priests have delivered thee unto me; what hast thou done? Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence. Pilate therefore said unto him, Art thou a king then? Jesus answered, Thou sayest that am a king. To this end was born, and for this cause came into the world, that should bear witness unto the truth...." So clearly Jesus was not silent at his trial by any stretch of the imagination.

Eighth, while discussing clues as to who is the true messiah they state on page 60 that "He must fit the following descriptions," the seventh one listed by them being that he will be smitten and spit upon, killed with thieves, be buried in a rich mans tomb, and come back to life after death. Unfortunately they neglected to provide chapter and verse to verify these assertions.

Ninth, while discussing Zechariah 12:10 ("And will pour on the house of David, and on the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of prayers. And they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him, as one mourns for an only son...") they state on page 81, "This prophecy only fits Jesus Christ. Why? Because Jesus Christ is the only One who ever claimed to be God, claimed to be the Messiah, and was crucified by the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Wrong on all three counts! Many have claimed to be God and the messiah and Jesus was not the only person executed by crucifixion in Jerusalem.

Tenth, on page 91 they state, "The messianic prophecies are minute and specific in detail." No they certainly are not, especially when it comes to any kind of direct application to Jesus Christ. Far too many are too vague and ambiguous to be clearly applied to any one individual; far too many are clearly inapplicable to Jesus, and far too much evidence proving Jesus could not be the messiah is totally ignored.

Eleventh, on page 91 they state, "The prophecies do exist, and even skeptics (whether or not they accept Him, as Messiah) admit that they remarkably fit the life of Jesus." I don't know what skeptics our notable crew is referring to but I certainly would not include myself among them. When the prophecies which apologists so freely rip out of context are restored to their proper milieu the conclusion is inescapable. They can almost never be applied to Jesus Christ in particular. Even broad and nebulous generalizations that are applicable to him can simultaneously be applied to thousands of others.

Twelfth, on pages 103-105 they make a few more observations worthy of note. They begin by saying, "The NT writers were so convinced that the Hebrew Scriptures had miraculously and clearly predicted the birth, life, and death of Jesus Christ that they preached this at the daily risk of losing their lives. History records they eventually were martyred because of their belief." Aside from the fact that the Roman Empire had hundreds of cults and sects making all kinds of challenging and potentially serious claims with impunity, one can't help but wonder why our authors failed to cite even one historical source to corroborate all this alleged martyrdom on the part of Christianity's earliest protagonists. Certainly there is nothing in the Bible to justify such assertions.

Thirteenth, they allege that "The great bulk of the NT quotations are careful reproductions or translations of the original Scripture. In most instances the historical sense is carefully preserved.... Careful examination of the evidence (comparing the NT passages quoting Hebrew passages) reveals there can be no doubt that the NT writers fairly quoted the Hebrew Scriptures." One need only read our issues on misquotations and misinterpretations to see the inaccuracy of this comment. Misinterpretations, misquotations, and manufactured quotes abound.

Fourteenth, on page 107 they correctly state that "For Jewish scholars the idea of the resurrection was not connected with the Messianic expectations of salvation." But in an attempt to prove the OT predicted a future resurrection of the messiah they state, Isaiah 53:10--11, without specifically using the word resurrection, certainly calls for it. It does? Where? The verses in question state verbatim, "Yet, it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief: when thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand. He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities." These verses not only don't refer directly to a resurrection; it is not even implied, unless one stretches his imagination beyond the limits of reasonable interpretation in order to gain the meaning desired. At best they merely relate to a sacrifice for others but that by no means necessarily entails a resurrection.

Fifteenth, on page 112 they state, "It is true that not all of the Jews during Jesus time accepted Him as the Messiah. Because of this, there are some today who claim there is no reason why anyone ought to believe Jesus was the Messiah. But such persons have a hard time explaining why literally thousands of Jews did accept Jesus as their Messiah." What kind of comment is that! Literally scores of alleged messiahs had thousands of followers during that day and age. Does that, therefore, substantiate their claims? Jesus was only one among many. Since when did the number of followers correlate with the truthfulness of the message. Thousands of people have ardently accepted all kinds of fallacious and ephemeral concepts and beliefs throughout history. Hitler had millions of devoted followers and Santa Claus has millions of believers, but that hardly eradicates the lies of one and the fictitious nature of the other. This constant appeal to numbers by apologists as a justification for accuracy and truthfulness is no more valid now than when first submitted centuries ago.

Sixteenth and lastly, on page 120 they state, "If Jesus Christ did, in fact, rise from the dead, then one must accept the claims about Himself as being true--that He was in fact God Incarnate. No one else of an estimated 100 billion persons who have ever lived in human history has ever risen from the dead." If there is any instance in which these authors failed to do their homework it lies in the inaccuracy exposed by this poorly-researched comment. One does not need to study history to refute this assertion because their own book provides numerous examples of people rising from the dead prior to Jesus. Lazarus, the Widow at Nain's son, Elisha, Samuel, Jairus's daughter, and some saints all rose before Jesus. As have said on several occasions: By the time Jesus rose from the dead this was actually a rather common occurrence. would think it would have been met by a resounding yawn followed by, so what else can you do, rather than astonishment.

The most reasonable conclusion to be garnered from a careful analysis of this book is that it is not only tendentious and biased in its portrayal of scripture but not to be viewed as a valid depiction of messianic prophecies and fulfillments.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #735 from FA of Santa Rosa, California.

Dear Dennis. In your response to GN in letter #726 you said Jesus birth in a manger would imply to some that he was born into poverty. But Luke 2:7 gives the impression that Joseph and Mary intended to stay at the inn, and since it was full, they had no choice but to stay in the stable.

Since Jesus was born as Christ and King of the Jews, Matthew 2:2-4, I believe his family was well-to-do. The wise men merely added to the family wealth, when they opened their treasures and gave him gold, frankincense and myrrh, Matthew 2:11.

It is my understanding that Jesus was King of the Jews by virtue of his birth into the Hasmonean Royal Family. This would make him pretender to the throne of Israel. Rome killed Jesus because he was King of the Jews as is clear by the writing on the cross.

Jesus was not born into poverty and at no time in his life did he ever miss a meal--except by his own choice. Jesus fared more sumptuously than even the rich man in the parable. The gospels tell us Jesus attended feasts and banquets one after another. The only thing Jesus missed was the opportunity to sit on the throne of Israel and wear the crown as King, as his forebears the Hasmoneans did.

Editors Response to Letter #735

Dear FA. You began rather well. I can understand your assumption that since they only stayed in the manger because they were denied lodging in the inn they would appear to have been reasonably well off. But you went downhill from there.

You say, "Since Jesus was born as Christ and King of the Jews, Matthew 2:2-4, I believe his family was well-to-do." But that is merely a belief. Do you have any textual support for it. And what leads you to believe he was the expected savior predicted by the Jews, especially in light of the fact that nearly all Jews rejected him as their Messiah and their King. Just because people make claims does not mean they are valid. He certainly did not fulfill the OT messianic prophecies as we showed in several issues.

You say, "It is my understanding that Jesus was King of the Jews by virtue of his birth into the Hasmonean Royal Family." And later you state, "The only thing Jesus missed was the opportunity to sit on the throne of Israel and wear the crown as King as his forebears the Hasmoneans did." Do you have any support for your belief that he was of Hasmonean descent? From whence comes that belief, since there is nothing of a scriptural nature to buttress your contention. In fact, the word "Hasmonean" doesn't even appear in the Bible.

You say, "Rome put Jesus to death because he was King of the Jews as is clear by the writing on the cross." One can assert that he was put to death for claiming to be King of the Jews; that is biblically sustainable. But there is nothing of substance to actually prove he was the King of the Jews. What would lead you to believe that he was put to death for being King of the Jews, in fact, rather than in mere acclamation? You are alleging he actually was King of the Jews which is not verifiable from Scripture.

Moving on, you state, "Jesus was not born into poverty and at no time in his life did he ever miss a meal--except by his own choice." I cant help but wonder where you obtained that piece of information as well. Would you cite chapter and verse to prove that Jesus never missed a meal. That could be true, but I know of nothing in scripture that will corroborate it.

You state, "Jesus fared more sumptuously than even the rich man in the parable. The gospels tell us Jesus attended feasts and banquets one after another." He attended a few that is true, but one after another? Hardly! have never been a fan, proponent, supporter, or propagandist for Jesus Christ, as you well know, but I would not go so far as to make the kinds of disparaging claims you are uttering. Again I would pose the question: Where on earth are you getting all this? With all due respect FA you are engaging in the same kind of enterprise to which apologists are so addicted and love to wander--embellishing the text--adding material that is nowhere to be found in scripture.

Letter #736 from DS of Tustin, California

Dear Dennis.... enjoy your newsletters very much, BUT you sometimes become more sarcastic than I am, and can really get heavy. And although most writers deserve it, I think you might turn them off.

Editors Response to Letter #736

Dear DS. I can understand your concern and that is the chance one takes in every exchange of that nature. But I have always operated on the premise that people will accept poignant comments as long as you are being truthful or are sincerely trying to be truthful. People are generally able to set aside their feelings if the topic is of such importance that they are motivated to put truth and accuracy above self-image. I cant help but think of the people who call radio programs for advice on a wide variety of topics knowing full well that the host of the program is probably going to be anything but sympathetic, cordial, or even civil. Then, again, maybe they are just masochists.

It might interest you to know that a few people have told me that should be more assertive. So I have people on one side urging me to be more forceful, while some on the opposite are nudging me to be more reticent. So far, I have confined most of my acerbity to the Internet where many people seem to have a strong proclivity toward sarcasm, pejoratives, and egotism.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #737 from JN of Pennsylvania

(JN, a longtime supporter of BE, found himself involved in a discussion with a biblicist who said, "You say the bible is full of contradictions but I will tell you why you think the bible is full of contradictions. First Corinthians 2:14 says, 'the natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of god: for they are foolishness to him:

neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.' You can not find any contradictions in the holy bible if you are a spiritual man of GOD." JN sent the following reply to his critic--Ed.).

Paul wrote Corinthians, and he was once a "natural man"--he was not only a "natural man," but a Jew who actively persecuted Christians. Although Paul does not explicitly define the term "natural man," he alludes to it in 1 Cor 15:45-46 which says, "So it is written: 'The first man Adam became a living being', the last Adam, a life-giving spirit.. The spiritual did not come first, but the natural, and after that the spiritual." Paul suggests all men are born natural, since he says, "the spiritual did not come first, but the natural, and after that the spiritual." If this is true, how on earth did this "natural man," Paul, ever get to be a Christian who could write his precept concerning the "natural man." In order to write this inspired scriptural precept, i.e. "divine truth," he FIRST had to be inspired by "God." But how could he EVER have been so inspired, if the "natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of god"?

Of course this applies to every person, unless it can be proven that some are born Christians from the very first minute of life. However this seems biologically unlikely or impossible and Paul himself rules this out in 1 Corinthians. It would appear that ALL PEOPLE WERE OR ARE NATURAL MEN initially, and thus, being so, could NEVER BECOME CHRISTIANS, since the natural man can not receive the things of the spirit of god, for they are foolishness unto him.

CONCLUSION: There are no Christians and never were any. Paul could not have become a Christian or written any inspired "scripture." If what Paul says is true, 'all' Biblical authors started out as natural men, and were thus prevented from discerning spiritual things. Thus, the Bible couldn't be inspired by "God."

Editors Response to Letter #737

You raise an interesting point, JN. How could the natural man, Paul, have ever converted and become a spiritual man to begin with, since the natural man understands not the things of the spirit? I see you are again operating on the premise that if apologists can repeatedly use a verse to expediently escape a dilemma you can use it to create one. Judging from your prior writings, this appears to be one of your favorite stratagems. Good approach!

Letter #738 from GH of Okemos, Michigan

Dear Dennis: Thank you for sending me your listing of materials! I am attempting to order (purchase) some audio tapes from you. Therefore, you may be contacted by the following company....

Please allow me to explain the situation. We prisoners are ONLY allowed to purchase audio cassette tapes from the officially designated ("approved vendor") for tapes.... Mostly, they sell all kinds of music from major companies. As for educational and/or religious tapes,.... we must first place the order with this company and give them the full name & address of the primary vendor. Then., if this company fails to provide the tapes ordered, we can go to the Chaplain, show him the documented proof that we first attempted the order via this company without success.... THEN we are allowed to order those religious tapes directly from the primary vendor.

When I attempted to send a prepaid order directly to you, for $42.00 worth of tapes, it was NOT processed, and I was advised of the above. In compliance with Policy & Procedure, I have this day placed the tape order with the company and given them your name & address, as the primary vendor. Thus, sometime within the next couple of weeks the company may contact you in regard to obtaining the tapes from you. If they choose to not fill the order, then I'll be able to go to the Chaplain, and order them directly from you. But we are not allowed to order anything from a private party. So, if I do end-up being able to order your tapes directly from you, I'll have to address the check to "McKinsey Biblical Tapes or such, so that it sounds like I am contacting a company rather than a private party. And you shouldn't have a problem cashing a check made payable to "McKinsey Biblical Tapes." If there is or would be a problem, please advise.

Editors Response to Letter #738

Dear GH. What bothers me most about your letter is that you have to have the chaplain approve purchases of material focusing on religion and the Bible whenever this company you are required to go through fails to act. Isn't that analogous to putting the lion in charge of the sheep? Doesn't your prison have a librarian who routinely orders books, magazines, and periodicals? Why can't that person be be your go-between. Surely someone connected with the prison has to regularly order a lot of forms and other papers. Why couldn't that person be in charge of ordering this kind of material, since it is in their bailiwick, so to speak? The implication is very strong that a religious figure has intentionally been placed in charge of all religious censorship. What perks do you receive if you show up for Sunday services? I repeatedly receive letters from prisoners outlining how religion is imposed on them by one means or another while they are incarcerated. I cant help but feel that if American prisons were as concerned with teaching people trades and useful skills as they are with religious indoctrination, this country would be much better off. But one is considerably less expensive than the other, isn't it.

You might be interested in knowing that we have not yet been contacted by either the company or the Chaplain. I wonder why!

Letter #739 from DC of Evanston, Wyoming

Dear Mr. McKinsey. Please send me information on how I may begin receiving your newsletter. I am in desperate need of any information on Bible errancy. My wife and are recovering fundamentalists after suffering 30 years of indoctrination. We are new subscribers to the Skeptical Review and have found it to be wonderful medicine.

Letter #740 from TW of Springfield, Ohio

Love the TV show. Tape it as often as can, much to the dismay of various family members who don't like to rock the boat. Please send me the free list of materials as advertised at the end of each show....

Question: if valuables (such as gold, silver, gems, etc.) aren't to be envied and are the root of all evil (as God claims), then why are the streets of Heaven paved with gold? While gold is fairly flexible, cant see it as being a competent building material.

Anyway, keep up the fine work. Your last show on biblical number implausibilities was dead-on.

Letter #741 from JK of Leawood, Kansas

Dennis. First of all many thanks for all of your years of hard work debunking the Holy word. am going to start buying a collection of your works beginning with the years of 1983 in order to create a library for other nonbelievers in the Kansas City area. If you happen to know of other subscribers in the area, would appreciate knowing their names.

Editors Response to Letter #741

Dear JK. We have had a long standing policy of inserting the names, addresses, and phone numbers of anyone who wishes to be contacted by any of our readers. Just send me this information and will include it at the end of a future issue.

Letter #742 from JW of Palm Springs, Florida

Cant say enough about how much enjoy your work, so wont even try. Please send me issues 85 through 156.

EDITORS NOTE:

(a) In last months issue JN of Lancaster, Pennsylvania had a long letter in which he employed some rather acerbic language to criticize RPHL and the latter's quotations from Geislers book. JN would now like to make the following comment in that regard:

CORRECTION: I would like to retract any and all ad hominems ("idiots," "liars," etc.) in my submitted material, and apologize to all concerned.

(b) We, too, would like to make an apology. Our audio duplicating machine recently began to perform improperly without our knowledge. If you have received audio tapes from us in which the sound is too low and/or seems muffled, please return them to us and we will send you a new and improved version of the contents. The machine has been repaired. We just exhausted the poor thing. Again, we would like to apologize for any inconvenience this may have caused anyone.

(c) We would like to thank those who submitted contributions to assist our effort to buy a Super VHS recorder and all our original tapes. Now we can purchase the SVHS recorder and our original tapes and use the latter as originals when we send our supporters tapes of our programs.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #743 from NB of Tucson, Arizona

Regarding your comments on the final part of my letter #690 in BE #166, I have a few (a very few) comments:.... Second, you refer to countries where freedom from religion doesn't exist, although interestingly, the three countries you specify happen to be Muslim countries. You made no mention, for example, of the Republic of Ireland, where the Roman Catholic Church functions as a "fourth branch" of the government, and where abortion is still illegal and until recently divorce was illegal; or Northern Ireland, where Protestants have been oppressing Catholics for decades, or even Mexico, where the President and Vice President must belong to the Roman Catholic Church.

You may be too young to remember it, but I remember only too well when the words "under God" were interpolated into the Pledge of Allegiance--Congress did that in 1954, at the height of Sen. Joe McCarthy's reign of Terror. "In God We Trust" got on our coins because a Protestant minister in 1861 (when the Union forces were losing early battles of the Civil War) wrote to Treasury Secretary Salmon P. Chase suggesting that there be some sort of acknowledgment of Almighty God on our coins. A year later Chase ordered a phrase slightly modified from the fourth stanza of the "Star Spangled Banner" (which didn't become the national anthem until 1931): "In God We Trust" was put on coins to be issued in 1864. Legend has it that Chase, who was deeply suspicious of President Lincoln, chose that phrase to imply that in Lincoln he did not trust. In any case, coins with that phrase did appear in 1864, and from time to time after that. In 1902, President Teddy Roosevelt asked Congress to take them off our coins for good, but Congress told T.R. to stuff it. Finally in 1955, just after Joe McCarthy's fall, Congress ordered In God We Trust to be on all future coins and currency.

You may not be aware that until 1914 the "Establishment of Religion" clause of the First Amendment was construed to apply to Congress, not the states, and until the 1820s several states, including Connecticut and Virginia, did have "state churches" and believers and nonbelievers alike were required to pay taxes to support them. In 1914, the Supreme court held that the Fourteenth Amendment applies the same restrictions to the states as the Bill of Rights applies to Congress. This ended the concept of "state churches", but hardly ended the controversy, as witness the so-called "Religious Freedom Restoration Act", which is now being challenged in the Supreme Court, the case before the Court concerning whether or not a Roman Catholic Church can build an "extension" into an area zoned for commerce.

Finally, you refer to my "gratuitous" observation that the only dissenter in the Tennessee State resolution was a Jew. In my Random House Unabridged Dictionary, "gratuitous" is defined as "given, bestowed, or obtained without charge or payment; free, voluntary; being without apparent reason, cause, or justification: a gratuitous insult." I assume that it is the latter definition to which you refer; but there was a palpable reason; Tennessee (where I did a lot of my growing up) is in the heart of the "Bible Belt", where all non-Christians are viewed as "strange", so it took quite a bit of courage for a Jew to vote against posting part of the law of Moses. Anyway, you say that you couldn't help but draw a "subtle suspicion", from that reference, without specifying what that suspicion was. I assure you that I am not Jewish, if that is what you meant, nor am I a fundamentalist, nor am I a "biblicist", if by that you mean that think that the Bible is literal, inert truth. often disagree with your interpretations of the Bible, but it can hardly be said that you haven't had "a fair and impartial hearing".

Editors Response to Letter #743

Dear NB. Although you are focusing on essentially extra biblical information, a few comments are in order.

First, I focused on Muslim countries because their intolerance shows religion at its worse and many countries in which Islam dominates are considerably more oppressive than Christian nations like Ireland, Northern Ireland, and Mexico, although it is more a matter of degree than kind.

Second, I assume your history lesson is as accurate as it is interesting.

And finally, in so far as my reference to the word "gratuitous" is concerned, I tend to suspect anti-Semitism when I see a Jew or Jews being singled out in what could be construed as a negative or critical manner. Apparently that was not the intent of your letter judging by your comment that it took quite a bit of courage for a Jew to vote against posting part of the law of Moses. That is not the kind of comment that would normally be associated with an anti-Semite and for that you are to be complimented rather than faulted. Your motives were ambiguous and for that reason I made no direct accusation.

Letter #744 from PW via Email (Part a)

(I pondered for some time whether or not the following email exchange should even be included in a reputable publication in light of the fact that more acidity than sagacity was created. It is indicative of the kind of dialogues that occasionally occur on the Internet and the depths to which conversations can descend and ego tripping can supplant intelligent discourse--Ed.)

Dear Mr. McKinsey, First of all, note that it is I who am browsing, not my software. The reaction comes from me, not from Netscape Navigator. You have no reason to trust me, nor to take my opinion as meaningful. As far as you're concerned, I'm just another 'net bum'. Yet I offer you this: I've just browsed a couple of your articles regarding the character of Jesus and of Paul, and have to say that I haven't seen a more confused analysis of the scriptures since I first encountered Mormon missionaries. In the dozen or more complaints about Jesus and Paul which I read, I found perhaps only one question which even raised an eyebrow; the rest were simply nonsense. I'm disappointed. Usually, when I read the questions bright atheists or agnostics pose, I find a few which stimulate my thinking, some reasonable observation which leads me to seek new light on some theological topic. I found nothing of this sort in your writing. Bummer.

Editors Response to Letter #744 (Part a)

You might be interested in knowing that I am wholly unimpressed with your criticisms, since they are so obviously lacking in specifics and clearly wedded to glittering generalities. Like so many Christian apologists you employ the nebulous to fool the credulous. Since you proved nothing whatever, there is no reason for me to even move an eyebrow much less raise one.

You say, "You have no reason to trust me, nor to take my opinion as meaningful" and with that I could not agree more. With an analysis as anemic as yours, one would hardly be reasonable to proceed any other way.

You refer to yourself as "just another 'net bum.'" I don't know about the "net" aspect but I have every reason to accept the rest. For someone so unwilling to discuss specifics and apparently unable to present a case, to use the word "nonsense" in regard to those of the opposite persuasion is the height of duplicity, not to mention ideological irrelevance and impotence.

Letter #744 Continues (Part b)

I am impressed, however, with the sheer volume of your writings. You clearly take religion seriously if it absorbs so much of your physical and emotional energy. I wonder if you know why you spend so much energy refuting something you consider worthless.

Editors Response to Letter #744 (Part b)

Because it needs to be done, that's why! That should be obvious to anyone who has not been indoctrinated, if not brainwashed, from infancy. If you had read all of my issues as well as my book, you would not have asked such an inane question.

Letter #744 Continues (Part c)

I don't for a second buy your explanation that the topic is unbalanced. Christian pulpits and seminaries are full of men and women who detract from the veracity of the Bible, the historicity of Jesus and the integrity of Paul and the other apostles. One needs to choose carefully to find a corner of Christianity in which these things are NOT defamed.

Editors Response to Letter #744 (Part c)

You don't watch TV or listen to the radio very much do you. You appear to be completely oblivious to the influence of the religious right in this country and the amount of one-sided propaganda that is being disseminated throughout the land to influence the masses. For every one who mirrors your description, hundreds do not. I assume you are some kind of latter-day pseudo-intellectual troglodyte.

And if you had bothered to read all of my issues you would know that they concentrate on biblical inerrancy and fundamentalism. I don't think you even managed to read the title of the publication, let alone the sub caption.

I am going to do you the favor of forgetting that you even made a statement so ignorant as, "I don't for a second buy your explanation that the topic is unbalanced." When is the last time you heard someone on the national or local media make the kinds of statements found in this publication? In fact, I'm tempted to go even further and not let others know you uttered a comment that detached from reality. But, alas, my conscience, convictions, clarity, and clobber-them-as-necessary commitments won't let me.

Letter #744 Continues (Part d)

You've got some other agenda cooking, probably somewhere in your past. Do you know what it is?

Editors Response to Letter #744 (Part d)

Yes, indeed; it is called the "Let sanity reign" agenda.

Letter #744 Continues (Part e)

In response, it would be perfectly legitimate for you to ask why I should take the time to tell you I don't find your writing helpful. I don't know the answer, but am considering the question.

In case you're interested in whom it is that chides you, I'm a 42-year-old Jewish American male who believed the gospel at the age of 19. I have a graduate degree in business. I've studied the scriptures and theology seriously, for a layman. I describe myself as "an Evangelical with footnotes," because there are several positions held by Evangelicals which I don't believe hold water, strict inerrancy among them. My IQ is high but falls short of genius; however, I scored in the 99th percentile in analytical reasoning on the GRE. I know soundly reasoned analysis when I read it. Yours ain't.

Editors Response to Letter #744 (Part e)

Is all of this supposed to impress me? It don't. Nor does your evolution toward mental decrepitude. Adolph Hitler had a high IQ too and you can see where that got us and what he did to millions. Unless you have some concrete and specific facts to not only present but prove, please don't clutter up my computer screen again with your drivel. There is none so deaf as he who won't hear and you're a quintessential example of same. Come back when you are more qualified, more researched, and more willing to provide details. Right now about all you are capable of doing is regurgitating the excrement you swallowed from childhood.

Letter #744 Concludes (Part f)

(PW ended his attack with the following vacuous quotation--Ed.).

They are asleep; and in their dreams they have made alarm clocks illegal.

Editors Concluding Response to Letter #744 (Part f)

P.S. Your concluding quote is about as coherent and relevant as your entire monologue. If that is the best you can do, then you are in even worse shape than I thought. You need help my friend.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #745 via email from KL

Dear Mr. McKinsey,

I recently came across the web site for your Biblical Errancy newsletters. I downloaded many of the issues and have been browsing them off-line.

I want to congratulate you for the amazing work that you've done. I myself, in relation to a project have been working on, started over a year ago to research and seek out those inconsistencies and factual errors in the Bible that I'd always heard existed. But after spending perhaps 50 or 100 hours on the project--quite fruitful, but tedious-- I thought to myself that surely someone has done all this work before and was simply duplicating labor unnecessarily. So off to the library I went. But even there it was not easy to find a book dedicated to the type of Biblical research I was looking for. And so to the Internet I went where I found your newsletters. I have also since then discovered that Prometheus Books published your Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy, which I have not been able to find anywhere (Just contact me--Ed.) and presume is a compendium of the high points of your newsletters.

I will come out right here at the beginning and say that I am most definitely NOT a Christian, and though I am genetically and culturally Jewish I believe that monotheism in general is one of the greatest tragedies ever to befall mankind. Of the three main branches of monotheism, I'd say that Christianity and Islam are equally heinous, drenched as they are in intolerance, ignorance and blood. Judaism, though it is the parent religion of the other two, is far less noxious because it is not evangelical and has no desire to convert everyone in the world to its beliefs. True, the Jews of the Old Testament waged war and slaughtered their neighbors, but if truth be told they were no worse in their behavior than most ethnic, religious or national groups of that period. Nor was their self-righteous belief system any more extreme than that of other ancient peoples.

The reason I am writing to you is this: I am working on producing a series of anti-propagandistic cartoon booklets, very similar in style to Chick Publications' which are Christian right-wing brainwash tracts (which I'm sure you're familiar with). But instead I will be presenting a sane point of view, that of a rational, humanity-centered realism. The reason I am doing this is that the vast majority of humanist/rationalist knowledge and debunking literature out there is targeted toward intellectuals and already-confirmed nonbelievers. My proposed booklets are meant to be handed out or sent to Christians, especially those who desperately need some enlightenment. (Priests and ministers long ago learned that "preaching to the choir" is ineffectual in winning new converts, and that if one wants to get across one's viewpoint it is best to present it to people who don't already hold one's belief system.)

Some aggressive or inquisitive Christians do read publications like The Biblical Errancy Newsletter or books from the Prometheus catalog, if only at least to get a peek into the enemy's camp. But the truth is, your average American Christian would rather chew glass than expend intellectual effort reading anything antithetical to his beliefs. Most Christians (and most Americans) are semiliterate, uninquisitive, and have absolutely no interest in seeking out any upsetting information. Most Christians have surrounded themselves with a cocoon of brain-numbing Christian propaganda--television, radio, books, magazines, friends, community--and will never even encounter the kind of information presented in Biblical Errancy. They don't argue with you because they don't know you exist, and they never will.

We need to reach these pathetic, deluded people and bring them back in the fold of humanity. But we will not reach them with highfalutin intellectual treatises that require thought on the part of the reader. They've been brainwashed and we need to unbrainwash them.

Consider these very informative quotes from the Chick Publications catalog and web site:

"'This Was Your Life' (the first Chick cartoon tract) was converted to booklet form after Bob Hammond, missionary broadcaster of 'The Voice of China and Asia,' told Chick that the multitudes of Chinese were won to communism through cartoon booklets. Jack Chick decided to try to use the same technique to win souls for Christ."

Very interesting! The ubiquitous Christian evangelical tracts are in fact consciously emulating a successful communist educational device. If the Christians can steal an idea from the communists, we can steal the same idea from the Christians. It must work, or it wouldn't be worth stealing.

"Before you can share the gospel with someone, you must first get their attention. The world knows how to get and hold people's attention...with pictures--television, movies, videos, comics, etc. Chick tracts use the same technique, using irresistible cartoon pictures to grab the reader's attention. Nobody, young or old, can resist cartoons."

These Chick people are not as ignorant as they seem. Many studies have indeed proven that visual images draw attention more quickly and leave a stronger impression than words alone.

Once attracted by the cartoon, people are drawn into Chick tracts by the interesting real-life or dramatic stories. The combination of dramatic stories and cartoons make Chick tracts irresistible. Many Christians who were discouraged because their wordy tracts were rejected or thrown on the ground have been thrilled to see how readily people accept Chick tracts. The devil doesn't mind it when Christians hand out gospel tracts...just as long as nobody reads them. But when Chick tracts are distributed, he blows a fuse, because he knows that nobody can resist them. Chick tracts GET READ!"

If wordy Christian tracts get thrown on the ground, you can imagine what happens to wordier, anti-Christian books: they don't even get picked up in the first place!

"Once hooked by the cartoons and drawn in by the dramatic stories, readers soon learn that woven into each story is a basic gospel message, presented in a way that anyone can understand. No deep theological concepts, no confusion, just a simple gospel message, showing that everyone must be born again through faith in Jesus Christ."

Tempted as I am to do otherwise, I plan to emulate the successful Chick formula here: keep the message of the cartoon booklets as simple as possible. This of course will be a much more difficult task, since Christianity offers a simplified, irrational quick-fix "solution" to complicated real-life problems; whereas the real way to fix society's ills involves deep thought, hard work, and coordinated effort - not a concept that can be easily summarized in a meaningless catch-phrase or in a cartoon picture.

"From a humble beginning on Jack Chick's kitchen table over 35 years ago, Chick Publications has grown to an international ministry, providing soul winners with illustrated gospel literature, including English Chick Tracts, Spanish Chick Tracts, and Chick Tracts in over 60 other languages. Over 400 million have been sold."

Think about it: 400 million Christian propaganda booklets. That's probably more than the sum total of all the book sales of all the humanist, atheist and rationalist publishers in the world this century. And Chick Publications is only one of dozens of Christian companies putting out these booklets. We're fighting a flood of ignorance with a single sandbag of truth.

The time has come to give the Christians a dose of their own medicine. In the last decade, Christian political activists have co-opted and consciously imitated the social protest techniques pioneered by liberals in the '60s: boycotts, nonviolent picketing, letter-writing campaigns, grassroots organizing. And they've used these techniques to great effect. It's sweet justice to turn the tables on the Christians by co-opting one of their most successful evangelical techniques and using it against them.

I am working with an extremely talented cartoonist whose eye-catching style is perfect for propaganda. I won't go so far as to send you a mockup script for one of the tracts because I don't want to inundate you with information. Besides, I haven't finished writing them yet. But I will say that I am putting a great deal of thought into how to make them the most effective, primarily by debunking fundamentalist Christian claims and showing how rational thought, not blind faith, will solve both the readers' individual problems and society's problems at large.

I am writing to you for two reasons: first to get your overall opinion of this booklet idea--whether or not you think it's a worthwhile project to pursue; second to ask if you have any suggestions as to whom I should approach with the proposal. I don't want to do all the publishing myself - too much of a hassle! I'd like to work with an outside publisher, organization, or interested group, but I don't have the slightest idea where to begin. You've been involved in debunking Christian claims for a long time, and so you know the field much better than me. To whom should propose this idea?

Thanks for your time. You can add me to your list of admirers!

Editors Response to Letter #745

Your idea is interesting and worthy of consideration but I am not sure what kind of cartoons you have in mind. The ideas of rationality and logical thought just don't lend themselves to shocking, jolting, stunning or eye-catching jokes and cartoons. We are more educators than entertainers and for that reason our material is not really conducive to what you are trying to do. I think you exposed the inherent weakness in your own approach when you said, "This of course will be a much more difficult task, since Christianity offers a simplified, irrational quick-fix solution to complicated real-life problems; whereas the real way to fix society's ills involves deep thought, hard work, and coordinated effort - not a concept that can be easily summarized in a meaningless catch-phrase or in a cartoon picture." Nevertheless, I am certainly willing to read or view anything you have. By all means send me some examples and I will tell you what I think. As far as getting it published is concerned, first and above all, ask yourself: Is it going to make money. That is far and away the greatest concern of publishers and big profits require a big audience. You have to ask yourself: Is this really going to appeal to a mass audience. If your answer is no, then all I can say is, Good Luck. As many books as you have had published, based upon your bio accompanying this letter, you probably know better than I. I have come to the conclusion that the best way to get writings out to a sizable audience is through creation of a web site on the Internet. It is far and away the best hope for the little guy who is more interested in telling people what they ought to hear than what they want to hear, and more concerned with accuracy than popularity, profits, and production. With the NET you can tell it like it is, and that is tremendously attractive. For the first time in my life I have actually been able to reach a large audience without going through a battery of censors and a gauntlet of editors. You don't have to cater to the whims, wishes, and all-encompassing concerns for the bottom line of publishers; you can express your real views without being concerned with who will be alienated; you don't have to worry about printings, mailings, postage, advertising, accounting, and deadlines, and you don't have to pander to the LCD in order to even get a hearing. Above all you don't have to put "Will It Make a Buck" in front of every concept, consideration, and conduct. Except for a very few publishers like Prometheus, most are far more concerned with what sells than that which is accurate, truthful, relevant, and non-escapist.

In any event, please keep me posted regarding how things are turning out. If it works, by all means proceed. But in the current anti-intellectual climate of this nation, thought-provoking, stimulating, challenging literature and conversation is not where the masses are. One need only view the TV talk shows that have replaced Phil Donahue or the news programs of Rather, Jennings, and Brokaw which supplanted the Cronkite era to see that.

Letter #747 from Anonymous Donor in Ohio

(An anonymous donor in Ohio sent us the following history of the world according to student bloopers. He obtained it from a teacher in what appears to be a religious school named St. Paul's. The teacher entitled his list The World According to Student Bloopers and prefaced his presentation by saying--Ed),

One of the fringe benefits of being an English or History teacher is receiving the occasional jewel of a student blooper in an essay. I have pasted together the following "history" of the world from certifiably genuine student bloopers collected by teachers throughout the United States, from grade eight through college level. Care has been taken to preserve all the misspellings found in the original document. Read carefully, and you will learn a lot.

(We abbreviated the teachers extended list to include only those quotes pertaining to the Bible, religion, and related material--Ed.)

The inhabitants of Egypt were called mummies.

They lived in the Sarah Dessert and traveled by Camelot.

The climate of the Sarah is such that the inhabitants have to live elsewhere, so certain areas of the dessert are cultivated by irritation.

Editors Response to Letter #747 and its addenda.

The writer of the Student Bloopers said, "Read carefully and you will learn a lot." I am not sure I learned much of anything other than the fact that some students can't spell or write coherently and know little about history or literature. When it comes to knowledge of the Bible specifically, it is hard to determine if that is a plus or minus, although I suspect the former.

REVIEW

One of the most famous apologetic defenses of the Resurrection ever written is a work entitled Who Moved the Stone by Frank Morison. Ever since it first appeared in 1930 biblicists have placed this tendentious masterpiece on virtually every resurrection book list imaginable. Touted as one of the most powerful answers to those doubting Jesus rose from the dead, it is widely distributed, often gratis. But unfortunately for those holding this work in such high esteem, Morison's summa resurrectica is anything but a knockout punch. Indeed, the work is so flawed that it would hardly be worthy of serious consideration were it not for the large number of people who rely upon its contents religiously. The most obvious inadequacy contained therein lies in the extremely large number of suppositions, hypotheses, assumptions, and qualifiers that are submitted as adequate replies, especially at critical junctures. Were all of this speculation to be granted, then Morison could very well have a writing worthy of top billing. But only someone who had taken leave of his senses would be so irresponsible and naive as to be that magnanimous toward Morison's inferences. Some of his conjectures, in no particular order of importance, are as follows:

First, while trying to portray Jesus as an intensely moral man, Morison states on page 22, "No one with an eye for historic truth, flashing out of the ancient pages of His (Jesus--Ed.) record, can fail to see what happened when they brought to Him the woman taken in adultery. He blushed." He did? Where does it say that? This is the typical kind of biblical embellishment that I have criticized so often in the past.

Second, more hype is found on page 28 where, while discussing witnesses at the trial, Morison says, "The problem, therefore, was to bring a conclusive case which was not only proof against possible criticism by the Seventy-one, but which also gave indisputable grounds for action under the Roman law. In the search for this formula many witnesses were apparently examined and their testimony rejected as insufficient." Where does Scripture state "many witness were examined?" The very fact that Morison resorts to one his favorite words, "apparently," proves that he is guessing.

Third, in an attempt to buttress belief in Jesus as the messiah and in order to explain the alleged maneuverings with respect to the arrest and trial of Jesus by his opponents under allegedly mysterious and furtive circumstances, Morison says on page 32, "What does all this signify? Personally, I am convinced that beneath the ostensible and acknowledged fear of the people, there was a deeper and more potent fear--a fear which explains all their singular hesitations and vacillations, until a welcome message reached their astonished ears--the fear of Christ himself." Morison adds to this gross conjecture by saying on the next page, "Personally, I cannot avoid feeling that, in all their dealings with Jesus, these men were apprehensive of something happening which they did not care to define. They seem to have been in some doubt whether even a considerable force would be adequate to take Him, and that in the last resort He might even prove to be unarrestable". To this one can only reply, "Good grief!" What in scripture would corroborate such broad speculation? He says he "cannot avoid feeling," when I'm having great difficulty feeling it at all.

Fourth, on page 36 he says, "Indeed, the probabilities were strongly in favor of that course" and on the next page he says "There seems to be no escaping this inference...." Two pages later he states, "The practical question which arose immediately, therefore, was probably this...." "Seems," "inference," "probably" and "probability" are hardly the words of sound, proven scholarship.

Fifth, while discussing the trial and its alleged behind-the-scenes maneuverings, Morison says on page 39, "Whatever else, therefore, had to be done, some considerable part of those three hours must have been occupied in hurried consultations, in swift passings to and fro between the executive sitting at the High Priests house, and those indispensable leaders of Jewish thought upon whom they must rely for ratification in the Sanhedrin. All this is written plainly between the lines of the narrative." Maybe the prescription for my glasses needs to be changed, but I don't see it plainly written anywhere, between the lines or otherwise.

Apparently aware that his fleeting flights of fancy were something less than ironclad demonstrable proofs and cognizant of the fact that he was vulnerable to criticism, Morison states on the next page, "If anyone feels that the received narrative does not quite carry this conviction...." Now why on earth would anyone think that?

Sixth, on pages 41 and 42 Morison attempts to explain the involvement of Pilate in the trial at so inopportune an hour as late at night by saying, "There was probably only one man in Jerusalem who could seek an audience with Pilate at an hour ordinarily devoted to his private pleasure. That man was Caiaphas, the High Priest, and it was Caiaphas, in all human probability, who went. He alone could present with the full authority of his supreme office the high reasons of state behind the prosecution." The words "probably" and "probability" permeate the allegedly potent scholarship of Morison.

In the very next paragraph he says, "It explains something which on any other supposition is wholly inexplicable," and in so doing is admitting that his thesis rests on supposition.

Seventh, on page 48 he states, "For consider the most likely trend of events upon that memorable night. Pilate was in town, not for a brief flying visit, but for the full ten days ordinarily covered by the Feast. The probability, therefore, that his wife, Claudia, came with him is very strong, even if we had not Matthew's definite statement that such was the case.... We shall not be very wrong if on this particular night we imagine them sitting before the fire in one of the spacious apartments of their private suite in the Palace, for we know from Peters warming of his hands that the evening was chilly." Constant repetition of words such as "likely," "probability," and "imagine," lead one to the conclusion that Morison might just as well have tossed the Bible aside and written his own script.

Eighth, on page 49 he says, "As I have suggested in a previous chapter, there was probably only one person in Jerusalem who could safely intrude himself upon the privacy of Pilate's household at such a late hour, and... that man was the High Priest himself." This is followed in the next paragraph with, "It would seem, therefore, that we shall be well within the margin of historical probability if we assume that some time between the hours of nine o'clock and eleven, and probably much nearer the latter than the former, a distinguished caller presented himself at the Herodian Palace. Possibly the visitor was shown directly into the private apartment but more probably Pilate went out to an antechamber to meet him." How often do we read so much guesswork in such a small amount of material in what is supposedly a well-researched, powerful, convincing scholarly writing? Not often!

Ninth, while discussing the trial on page 55 Morison states, "With this description now before us we can attempt a reconstruction of an incident which, both historically and psychologically, is probably without precedent in the annals of the world. The first definite act of the drama of which we have historical record is the bringing of Jesus from the place of His confinement (probably the High Priests house) to the place of trial. This occupied, perhaps, 20 minutes, but as it was still quite early probably few people witnessed the little procession as it made its way.... On arrival at the gate of the Palace we must probably allow for a halt of a few moments...."

On page 61 he provides more examples of speculation run rampant by saying, "But it was probably only when Judas arrived with the armed contingent that the dastardly and terrible character of the betrayal came home to them. After a brief and futile attempt at resistance on the part of Peter, the majority of them appear to have fled."

And on the next page he states, "Once inside the city gates they would probably follow the main body to the High Priests house.... With regard to the other nine disciples, I think it is very doubtful whether any of them slept in the city that night." "The women of the party were, therefore, in all human probability, cut off from direct knowledge...." and "The return of the arrest party was probably made by the least frequented route...." "But it seems to be implied in the narratives..." "We shall, therefore, be very near to the real truth in this matter if we assume that the women...or (as is more likely) by a hurried visit from Peter and John." If this be a reasonably accurate estimate of the position,...." The probability, too, that none of these 9 men had yet returned is...." Imagine! All of this guesswork can be found within just a few pages! If Morison had not been allowed to use the word "probably," a sizable portion of his entire book could never have been printed.

Tenth, one of the most disingenuous devices employed by Morison is his repeated attempt to make speculations sound as if they are certainties. For example, on page 39 he states, "Whatever interpretation we put upon the circumstances leading up to the arrest of Christ it seems to me certain that..." How can something be certain that just seems to be certain?

On page 63 Morison states, "That Jesus Christ died upon the Cross, in the full physical sense of the term, even before the spear wound was inflicted by the Roman soldiery, seems to me to be one of the certainties of history." If it only "seems" to be that way, how could it be a certainty?

On page 76 Morison says in regard to the arrival of the women at the tomb, "The one thing that seems to be certain is that on arrival at the tomb, they received a shock for which they were totally unprepared." Again, if it only seems to be such and such, how could it be a certainty?

Eleventh, on page 65 the text states, "That the mother of Jesus herself collapsed when the end came may be regarded as certain. The Gospel record plainly implies it." Really? Where?

Moreover, how can her collapse be "certain" if its merely regarded as having occurred? How can something be a certainty that's merely regarded as having occurred?

Twelfth, on page 70 he states, "This pointed omission of Salome during the actual interment can hardly have been accidental. It must mean that the writer of Marks Gospel wished to convey that Salome had gone away, presumably upon some pressing business." Again, more extrapolating.

Thirteenth, on page 71 Morison states, "We do not know, we cannot know, what earnest but fruitless attempts were made that day to keep Mary away from the Cross. She was no longer young, and the bloody scene of a triple crucifixion was no sight for an over strained and utterly heartbroken woman." Morison continues by saying, "The woman that John led away from that frightful scene was surely already half-fainting, dazed, and in less than half an hour, as fuller realization came, would surely collapse."

One of the most obvious and egregious failings of this entire book is the almost total lack of specific citations. Morison seems to have gone out of his way to avoid precise references to verses to corroborate his comments. Why he so behaved is not hard to fathom. If Scripture does not support you, then there is obviously much to be gained by avoiding citations. His repeated theoretical concoctions are vivid testimony to the expediency and prudence of such an oversight.

On the same page Morison completely exits reality while describing these same events by saying, "That, I take it, is the true reading of these events. It would have had to be inferred even if the Gospels contained no hint of it." Can you envision that! Apparently we are supposed to accept on his word alone a conclusion he has drawn, even if the Gospels contain no hint of it. Is there no end! And to think apologists accuse biblical critics of taking verses out-of-context and reading between the lines.

Fourteenth, on page 72 Morison says, "Peter overwhelmed with remorse and shame remaining in strict retirement." Scriptural support for this assertion would also be greatly appreciated. I know of nothing that says Peter was in retirement or went into retirement.

Fifteenth, on page 72 Morison addresses the contradiction we mentioned years ago created by the clash between Matthew's statement that the women arrived at the tomb "as it began to dawn" and John's assertion that they arrived "early, while it was yet dark." He states, "I cannot personally find any grounds, in the slight variation in these statements as to whether the sun had actually risen or not, for doubting the central fact in these quotations. One must not overlook the fact that the sun rises very quickly in the Southern latitudes...." Aside from the fact that there is more than a "slight variation" in the texts, it was all I could do to restrain my laughter when I first read this explanation. So the sun comes up faster in the south than in the north! One can just visualize the sun zipping up over the southern horizon as it creeps up over the northern one. What will apologists conjure up next?

Sixteenth, with respect to this early morning arrival Morison says on page 75, "That moment was undoubtedly at sunrise on Sunday morning. They would clearly choose an early hour to avoid publicity. They could hardly go before sunrise because it would be dark, and possibly also because the city gates would not be open. We are therefore very amply within the field of historic probability when we picture this little party...." Again more supposition and conjecture surreptitiously pawned off as fact.

Seventeenth, with regard to what occurred when the women arrived at the tomb Morison made a surprising admission on page 76 by saying, "It is not as though the different accounts agree. If they did we should have to approach the problem from a different angle. But they make no attempt or pretense of agreeing...." Well, at least we don't have this hurdle to surmount. He concedes the obvious--the accounts disagree.

Eighteenth, on page 80 Morison made another interesting comment when he said, "We must never forget that throughout the troubled five days which preceded the arrest, Jesus and His companions had made their home at Bethany. I have sometimes speculated as to whether the domestic arrangements in the house of the two sisters permitted of accommodating the 13 persons who constituted the party. Probably they did not...." He admits he is speculating, and there's that word "probably" again.

Nineteenth, more guesswork is evident on page 81 in which Morison says, "It seems probable, however....," "it may have been only prudent", and "If this is what happened."

Twentieth, after asking several questions in regard to how the disciples behaved at the time of Jesus' arrest, Morison says on page 82, "No one can possibly answer these questions with full knowledge and certainty, but we can hazard a guess and correct it by our observations later." He might as well adopt this approach, since it's the pattern he has followed throughout most of the book.

Twenty-first, before concluding the last 4 pages of chapter 7 Morison makes the following comments: "Assuming they got so far," "it is conceivable," "the disciples would in all human probability," "That this is what happened seems to be indicated," "this little group of people was probably laboring under the gravest apprehensions," "it is probable," and "Such, as I conceive it, was the most probable situation during those confused and dramatic hours when Jesus paid the great penalty." It goes without saying that all of this is rank speculation of the first magnitude and hardly indicative of proven research.

The only redeeming comment made by Morison in this regard is found at the end of chapter 7 where he admits that he is submitting his ruminations "tentatively and with respect as a possible solution." At least he's willing to make this concession, but unfortunately his supporters depict his work as conclusive, demonstrable and definitive. I don't think so!

Twenty-second, on page 100 Morison says, "Salome was the mother to two of the disciples; Mary of Cleophas, her sister, of two others." Where is textual confirmation of this?

Twenty-third, on page 117 Morison repeats that old refrain that 3 important NT figures died for the cause. He states, "They all suffered the extreme penalty of their convictions after the manner of that barbaric age--James in Jerusalem itself; Peter and Saul in Rome." And we are again compelled to ask where that is to be found in scripture.

Twenty-fourth, it is difficult not to be amazed at the amount of data apologists can glean from scripture that seems to elude biblical exposers. Good examples can be found on page 118 where Morison says with respect to Peter, "We find him on the whole a very lovable person, possessing possibly a rough exterior but an intensely warm and loyal heart; rather impulsive; quickly roused to sudden anger, but as quick to perceive and acknowledge the error of his ways it is the glory of this type of man that he is peculiarly susceptible to reason when the hot rush of some sudden emotion is past." Morison found all that in Scripture? My stars. I must have been reading while asleep.

Twenty-fifth, with respect to James and his witness to the resurrection, Morison says that because the priests could not command his allegiance "they slew him in the end" Where is that in Scripture?

Morison concludes his discussion of James by saying, "It is said that the Christians inscribed upon his monument the words: 'He hath been a true witness both to Jews and Greeks that Jesus is Christ'." So now we are supposed to accept hearsay as proof that Christians inscribed some specific words on a tombstone.

Twenty-sixth, in reference to the title of his book Morison states, "Whoever moved the stone, therefore, had presumably left the vicinity of the grave earlier in the morning, and while it was still dark." Even the title of the book is entangled in guesswork. "Presumably" is hardly a word emanating from strong data.

Twenty-seventh and lastly, another candid admission by Morison is found on page 169 in which he states with reference to this mystic church of believers, i.e., Christianity, "Why did everybody who caught the infection of this spring madness gravitate to Jerusalem as steel to a magnet? Why should so irrational a doctrine flourish most readily....?" Well, at least he admits the doctrine is irrational. Exposers of the Bible can now add another supportive testimonial to their portfolio.

So, in essence, instead of being a work of substance, Morison's book is actually nothing more than a series of hypotheses of what might have occurred given certain assumptions, presuppositions, and conjectures. That is hardly convincing scholarship, except for those already predisposed toward its predilections. In no way does the book merit the plethora of accolades with which it has been showered through the years, and one would be guilty of a decided disservice to others were he to recommend it to those concerned with serious scholarship and accurate assessments.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Dear Dennis.... I'll content myself with a few points. First, on the specific Biblical incident you cite (pp. 168:4-5): You note that 2 Kings 8:26 says that Ahaziah was 22 years old when he "began to reign", while 2 Chron. 22:2 says that he was 42 years old. Very well. A contradiction. They cant both be right, though they could both be wrong. You list these as (a) and (b) possibilities with a third possibility (c): both say 42 in the original or both say 22 in the "alleged" original. But there is a fourth possibility: they could both be right. First Kings 8:24 says that Ahaziah was 22 when he "began to reign". It was the custom for sons, at a certain age, to reign as joint rulers with their fathers, taking over as the sole ruler at the latter's death. Second Chronicles 22:2 can readily be interpreted as meaning that he was 42 when his father died and he "began to reign" in his own right.

Note also verse 4 where it is said (KJV) that "he did evil in the sight of the LORD like the house of Ahab; for they were his counselors after the death of his father to his destruction." Note that something happened "after the death of his father". It is not claimed that he did not "reign" before the death of his father.

Editors Response to Letter #748 (Part a)

Dear NB. You have provided yet another example of why I hold Christian apologetics in general and biblical apologetics in particular in such low esteem, if not contempt.

First, you say that "Second Chronicles 22:2 can readily be interpreted as meaning that he was 42 when his father died and he 'began to reign' in his own right." What does the text say? It says he began to reign. Do you see any words that even remotely imply it was done "in his own right"?

Second, you say "It is not claimed that he did not "reign" before the death of his father." How's that again? What does the word "began" mean? When 2 Chron. 22:2 says he began to reign at age 42, that is excellent proof he was not reigning prior to age 42. So how could he have "began" to reign when his father died. Either he was reigning or he wasn't. And if he was, then he could not have begun to reign.

And third, you say, "Note also verse 4 where it is said (KJV) that 'he did evil in the sight of the LORD like the house of Ahab; for they were his counselors after the death of his father to his destruction'. Note that something happened after the death of his father." How does this bear on the issue? What difference does it make what he did after assuming power at age 42?

Letter #748 Continues (Part b)

...Also, I asked you where in the Bible it says that Jesus was crucified on a Friday. You quoted three verses that said that he was crucified on the eve of the "Sabath" (sic). But didn't ask about the Sabbath; said FRIDAY.

Editors Response to Letter #748 (Part b)

You don't need to shout. You mean you don't have enough savvy to realize that when I say I mailed a letter on the day before Saturday I was referring to Friday? Unless Scripture actually spoon-feeds you the word "Friday", my comment is to be immediately discarded. You're really desperate for an escape my friend, because that is one of the flimsiest ploys have ever encountered.

Letter #748 Continues (Part c)

I already knew about the "Sabbath" verses, and would have no need to ask you about those.

Editors Response to Letter #748 (Part c)

If you already knew about them, then why did you ask how they pertained to a Friday Crucifixion? Cant you do a simple calculation that would be expected of any third grader?

Letter #748 Continues (Part d)

(After two rambling, disjointed, irrelevant paragraphs that made little sense and weren't worth trying to decipher--Ed.) NB says, Thus, the answer (of course) to my question is that nowhere in the Bible does it say that Jesus was crucified on Friday...

Editors Response to Letter #748 (Part d)

I have already answered this and there is no reason to repeat myself. If you don't know the day before Saturday (the Sabbath) is Friday, then there really isn't much I can do for you. If you wish to write another letter that is abbreviated and considerably more coherent, feel free to do so. But I am not going to waste a lot of time trying to interpret your non sequiturs and irrelevancies. Do you have any idea how disconcerting it is to reply to critical letters that are so poorly written, disconnected, and incoherent that deciphering them is an ordeal beyond the reward. And believe me, I have received some real humdingers over the years. Too often writing a reply has been much easier than clarifying the original message.

Letter #748 Continues (Part e)

Now, to a few topic (sic) we've touched on in previous letters. You belittled my notion of "two-sided triangles." OK, how about "triangles whose sides are infinitely long, never meet, yet enclose only a finite area? Are they in fact triangles? Do they even exist?

Editors Response to Letter #748 (Part e)

What kind of a question is this? It resembles your material I saw no reason to decipher. Now let me get this straight. You're trying to refute my contention that you can't have a two-sided triangle by referring to a figure you are not only unsure is a triangle but are not even sure exists. This is typical of that to which I am referring NB and unshrouds your tangential proclivities. You manufacture a concept ex nihilo and attempt to use that very idea to refute a concept that is more solid than granite.

Letter #748 Concludes (Part f)

You also talk about an "all-white black horse" (or an all black white horse). You might as well have spoken of an all-red green horse, but this would have no meaning to a color blind person, who could see only shades of gray. So your comparison depends on a preconditioned notion of color.

Editors Concluding Response to Letter #748 (Part f)

Earlier I said, "What kind of question is this?" Now feel compelled to say, "What kind of an answer is this?" What does colorblindness have to do with the color of something? You mean color does not exist until people can see it. How silly! How myopic! How solipsistic! That reminds me of a ridiculous discussion we had in a college philosophy class. If a tree falls in the forest and there is no one present to hear the sound, was there, in fact, a sound that occurred? Of course there was. Nature couldn't care less who is present and who isn't. If you hear it, you hear it; if you don't, you don't. But either way it occurred, regardless. Your kind of egocentric thinking is typical of those who believe the world revolves around them and could only have existed if mankind had been in charge from the beginning.

The analogy is no less true of colors. If you see it, you see it; if you don't, you don't. But it's there, regardless. You're forcing reality to conform to people's preconceptions and preconditioning, when reality works in reverse. Ideas don't determine material conditions; material conditions determine ideas. You're viewing life backwards, my friend.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #749 Via Email from EB of Brockton, Mass.

Hi Dennis. I am a subscriber to Biblical Errancy. I have noticed a few times something you do in your writings and I'd like to know why you do this. It is: When you speak of Jesus of Nazareth you sometimes refer to him as Jesus Christ. As we all know this means Jesus the Messiah! I try never to use that term (Christ--Ed.) when write about this man Jesus. I have a tremendous amount of respect for you and the work you do. Please don't take this as some kind of a challenge. I hope I haven't gone over the line in asking this question. I will quote the section I am using for this example. It comes out of the Aug. 1997 issue #176. In the Editor's Response to Letter #735 (Near the end of that response) you say, "He attended a few that is true, but one after another? Hardly! I have never been a fan, proponent, supporter, or propagandist for Jesus Christ, as you well know, but I would not go so far as to make the kinds of disparaging claims you are uttering."

In place of "Jesus Christ" I would have loved to see instead, "Jesus of Nazareth". And once again Dennis... I would feel very badly if I have done something that might make you feel that I am criticizing you. I have far too much respect for you and your work. I'm almost afraid to send this note. I only know of two people that stand as tall as you do for Atheism. That is, of course, you and Farrell Till. Where would Atheism be if it weren't for you two gentlemen. It even scares me to think about it.

Editors Response to Letter #749

Dear EB. Don't worry about hurting my feelings. Others have said far worse. Your question, incidentally, is quite good. I was wondering when someone would ask me this. I do it strictly for the sake of convenience because it is the term most familiar to biblicists. If I was only concerned with precision, you are correct. I would never use the phrase Jesus Christ, because scripture, itself, clearly shows that Jesus is not the biblical "Messiah" and the word "Christ" means messiah.

The phrase "Jesus of Nazareth" has its own problems, however. Jesus must have been a real, live, human being in order to have come from Nazareth. And that has been far from conclusively demonstrated, in light of the fact that there is scant extra biblical evidence for his existence.

EDITORS NOTE:

(a) We are again compelled to beseech your assistance. I need aid from biblically informed supporters of our cause who are on the Internet. Because nearly all of our back issues are on a web site (<http://members.aol.com/ckbloomfld>), we occasionally receive attacks, criticisms, questions, and requests for advice which I simply don't have time to address. I need some volunteers who would be willing to step into my shoes and carry on from there. Since there is only one of me, many internetees, and precious little time in which to operate, I simply cant do it alone. If you feel up to the task, sufficiently informed, and committed to the cause, please let me know via email. I will store your address and occasionally forward mail to you as it comes in. It goes without saying that this is a VERY important undertaking because you could very well be the only real critic of the Bible many people will ever encounter.

(b) Few articles have struck more of a chord than that written by KL in last months issue in regard to creating tracts like those of Jack Chick. KL contacted us via email and I did not retain his name or address. If you are listening, KL, would you be so kind as to contact us again, since several people with something to contribute to your enterprise would like to contact you.

REVIEW

One of the more prolific apologetic authors, Dr. M.R. DeHaan, published a book in 1962 entitled Genesis and Evolution. In light of the fact that this work was in its 16th printing in 1978 when I purchased a copy, one is tempted to conclude biblicists hold it in rather high regard. That is a judgment with which I cannot concur, however, because it is not only boringly repetitious but sprinkled with assertions that are intellectually deficient, as well as inaccurate. Some of the more prominent examples are the following.

First, almost from the beginning DeHaan tries to beguile the opposition by framing the biblical discussions within parameters of his choosing through focusing upon the very first verse in Scripture. On page 19 under a section entitled 'The Most Important Verse' he states, "...the first verse of the Bible becomes in a certain sense the most important verse in Scripture. The first verse of the Bible determines whether you are a believer or an infidel. What you think of this verse determines your whole attitude toward the rest of Scripture." Later, on the same page he states, "You either believe it or reject it." This is the kind of subtle indoctrination that is indicative of the more crafty apologetic writers because he is putting the entire issue in a context that works to his advantage. In effect, he wants us to think that accepting the Bible is a 50-50 proposition in which you have one out of two chances of being correct. One choice is as viable as the other; one deserves as much credibility as the other, and one is as provable as the other. So you pay your money and take your chances. That's the boundary within which he seeks to formulate the issue. The fatal mistake contained therein lies in the fact that he ignored my oft repeated refrain that the burden of proof lies on he who alleges. When DeHaan said "You either believe it or reject it" he erred egregiously. In truth, you either "prove it or reject it," and since he admitted on page 17 that "the Bible opens with a statement which must be believed. It cannot be understood, explained, or proven--it must be accepted by faith," the conclusion is obvious. He admits it cannot be proven, but we are supposed to believe it, nevertheless. Imagine the incredibly large number of preposterous ideas mankind would have to believe if it came down to someone saying, Admittedly what am contending cannot be proven but you should still believe it. One can say, without fear of exaggeration, that the sky would be the limit.

Second, on page 21 DeHaan resorts to some blatant hyperbole when he says with reference to Gen. 1:1, "If you reject this, you cannot believe anything else in the Bible. If Gen. 1:1 is not true, the Bible is a lie, for it begins with a lie." Even I would not go so far as to say every comment in the Bible is false because its initial assertion is erroneous. You would be hard pressed to find any book in a library that does not contain some truth, even if it is nothing more than the name of the author or publisher or the date of publication. Why would an entire book have to be erroneous just because the first verse is fallacious?

Third, continuing his ongoing attempt to cause others to accept the first verse on faith alone, DeHaan quotes Gen. 1:1 and then says on page 24, ""No argument is presented for the existence of God. No statement is given as to where He came from.... No details are added, no explanation is given. You are expected to believe it because God says it. Wrong again! You are expected to believe it because the author or authors of Scripture say it. DeHaan is assuming the very point at issue, namely, that the Bible is the perfect word of a perfect being--an assertion disproven by an avalanche of data. Intelligent biblical critics do not concede key points that are in dispute anymore than they accept the oppositions terminology or preferred bounds of discourse. One way or the other DeHaan is determined to cover the ground with fertilizer and seeds of his own choosing so that which grows will be of his own making. He knows that anyone with an agenda could hardly be expected to lose a game in which he wrote the rules.

Fourth, not only does DeHaan place great importance on the first verse in Scripture, but he attempts to encapsulate the entire book in the first three chapters by saying on page 18, "There is not a single doctrine, Revelation, or truth revealed in the rest of the 65 books of the Bible, which is not found in type or figure in the book of Genesis. The seed of every other Revelation is here. In the book of Genesis, and particularly in the first three chapters, we have every Bible doctrine introduced, and the rest of Scripture is but the unfolding of that which is already introduced in capsule form in the first three chapters of Genesis." He follows this up on page 33 by saying, "If the first three chapters of the Bible are merely a parable, or symbolism, a fable, an allegory, or a myth, then the rest of the Revelation of Scripture must also be accepted as a fable, an allegory, or a symbol. If the record of the material creation is not literal, how can we accept the new creation as literal?" And he follows this with, "...the situation is even more serious. If we get rid of the literal account of the fall of man, and Gods curse on creation..., then the necessity of the Cross is destroyed. Then the whole plan of salvation becomes myth, with no more credence than the mythological Pandora's Box. If the first three chapters of Genesis are not a literal account, then let us throw the Bible away and be done forever with the idle superstition and a senseless fetish of faith in a book which is only a collection of ancient fables." Sounds like a good idea to me and one that should be enacted posthaste in view of the fact that biblicists have no more proof for the first three chapters being literally true than they do for the first verse, which DeHaan concedes cannot be proven.

Fifth, DeHaan's biblical exuberance ascends to new heights of irresponsibility when he says on page 38, "The Bible is unique in its content, for it deals with every subject under heaven, and is the final authority on every subject with which it deals. This makes the Bible the most scientific Book under heaven." Aside from the fact that millions of subjects are not discussed in Scripture (football, yellow fever, the Panama Canal, Abraham Lincoln, wind surfing, computers, etc. ad infinitum) one can only shudder at the prospect of using the Bible as the final authority in a subject like chemistry, when none of the chemical elements is mentioned. Imagine studying the Bible to learn about our solar system when none of the other eight planets is discussed or to learn about cytology when the word cell never appears. If you had to rely upon the Bible to pass algebra or trigonometry, you might as well drop the course. Why go through the agony of preparing to flunk.

Sixth, on page 44 DeHaan states, "Where did the universe come from? What is its origin? How old is it? or is it without beginning? These questions have occupied the minds of men since the dawn of human history." So far so good. He continues, "The answers can be grouped under one of only two heads: Creation or Evolution. It is one or the other." False! These are by no means the only options, since different religions have provided a wide variety of answers as to the origin of the universe.

Seventh, DeHaan continues by accurately stating, "Either the record of Genesis is true, or it is false. Creation and evolution cannot both be true. The claim that theistic evolution is in harmony with the record of the Bible is a totally indefensible claim." But then he makes some flagrant mistakes that are committed by nearly all religionists. He says, "All of it harks back to the authority of that first verse in the Bible.... Right here in the very opening statement, the Bible declares something which science leaves totally untouched, and evolution persistently ignores and evades. And that is the matter of 'ultimate' origin. Where did everything begin? The Bible asserts that the universe was created out of nothing but God Himself. Evolution is defined as a scientific and philosophical effort to explain the origin and development of things in the universe. But this definition is not entirely true, for evolution does not solve the question of ultimate origin. It does not begin with nothing, but assumes there was something to begin with. It may go back and back and back indefinitely, but it must assume there was something from which everything came." Wrong on several counts.

(a) Evolution, or what I would prefer to call the materialist conception of history, accounts for ultimate origins quite easily. There were none, period. Matter is all that exists and it has always been here; it has always existed. It had no point of origin because it was never created to begin with.

(b) The materialist conception assumes there was something--matter--but it does not assume it had a beginning. It does not assume "there was something to begin with" because there was no "to begin with" to begin with.

(c) And since it had no beginning, it is utterly false to say "it must assume there was something from which everything came." That is precisely what it does not assume based on the very fact that it contends there was no beginning.

Eighth, DeHaan continues by saying of evolution that, "It assumes the existence of substances and forces working through successive transformations or evolutions, but it poses or offers no answer to the problem of a first cause." It does not answer the problem of a first cause because with materialists, unlike religionists/idealists, there is no first cause to pose a problem.

Ninth, DeHaan continues, "It begins with lifeless, inert matter or substance already existing, but cannot go back beyond this." No matter is inert in the sense of not moving because the atoms and molecules of which it is composed are constantly in motion. There is no such thing as motionless matter. And just as importantly there is no reason to go back beyond this because, again, there is no back beyond matter to go back to.

Tenth, DeHaan concludes this section by saying, "Here evolution stops, but the Bible goes back to the ultimate beginning and gives the answer in its opening statement, 'In the beginning God created....'" The Bible does not go back to an "ultimate beginning"; it manufactures one out of ethereal imaginings. It assumes, rather than proves, there was a "beginning", and completely evades the most obvious question in this regard, a query that has been asked by rational minds for centuries. If God created the universe, then who or what created God. If the religionist says, No one, God is eternal and was never created, then the sensible mind can easily reply, Then why can't I say that of matter. Why does matter, which is known to exist, have to have a creator, while God, who is not known to exist, does not?

Interestingly enough, DeHaan acknowledges this very problem on page 72 where he says regarding the materialist conception of beginnings, "Of course, we must admit that we are confronted with the same identical problem if we accept the Bible answer, 'In the beginning God.' We are still faced with the questions, How did God begin? Where did God come from? Who made God?"

Eleventh, on page 56 DeHaan made another statement with which I would agree. He stated, "We repeat, that if the evolutionary theory of the origin of man by evolution from lower animals were ever proved true, it would automatically disprove the Bible, and reduce it to an antiquated compilation of superstitions, fables, and fancies unworthy of a place in human history." Well, at least we now know where the Bible is headed.

Twelfth, DeHaan continues his attack on evolution by saying on page 57, Then, too, there is no room for a fall, for evolution teaches a development upward and not a fall downward to total depravity. Evolution has no place for sin and subsequently no place for an atonement, and since there is no need for an atonement, there is no need for a Savior." How right you are DeHaan. Evolution does, indeed, teach there is upward development and something to look forward to in this world.

I have always been amused, if not baffled, by the work of Christian psychologists, psychiatrists, priests, ministers, social workers and others. They can't help but transmit their belief that man is sinful, corrupt, and depraved to those whom they counsel, which can only lower peoples sense of self-esteem and self-worth, when an overwhelming number of those with whom these biblicists interact are in trouble precisely because they have little or no sense of self-worth and self-esteem. In effect, the Bible in general and Paul in particular are telling people they are sinners corrupt to the core and destroying their sense of self worth and self-esteem in the process, while many of Paul's current followers are trying to instill the opposite feelings. Talk about the left hand not being synchronized with the right hand! How could anyone have feelings of self-worth, self-esteem, pride, and dignity, when the Bible is telling him that he is utterly corrupt and sinful and little more than a piece of dung to quote Martin Luther. Prisons are heavily populated with people who have low self-esteem, and giving them a Bible is far more likely to exacerbate this problem than solve it.

Thirteenth and lastly, on page 92 DeHaan makes a comment that is decidedly at variance with scientific data in so far as am aware. He states, "Modern scholarship prates about the dignity of man and then debases him by tracing his ancestry to a most undignified chimpanzee." This assertion has rung throughout the halls of anti-evolutionism since time immemorial and is no truer now than when first uttered by those opposed to the writings of Darwin over a hundred years ago. Although not a scientist by trade, I know of no reputable scientist who ever said that man descended from apes, monkeys or chimps. Biblicists persist in making this provincial and benighted assertion despite the fact that it demonstrates an abysmal ignorance of basic evolutionary theory. Scientists have never said that man descended from apes or monkeys; they say man and the apes/monkeys descended from a common ancestor. Its like viewing a slingshot. Off a common trunk, one went one way and the other went another, but neither evolved from the other. This point is by no means trivial because it exposes the degree to which anti-evolutionists are unlearned with respect to even the simplest component of evolutionary theory.

In summary, as far as DeHaan's book in general is concerned, it leaves a lot to be desired. All too often faith replaces proof, and constant repetition is used as a primary means by which to inform and convey the authors predilections. Its another one of those apologetic writings I would recommend only to people who are afflicted with insomnia or possessed by pronounced masochistic tendencies.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #750 from DA of La Puente, California (Part a)

(DA insists on sending us letters in which he does not lay any groundwork for his assertions but just leaps right in as if we had all been discussing the issue for the last 2 days. I have repeatedly warned DA about this but he insists on ignoring my remonstrances as often as he ignores my corrections of his inaccuracies. His letters are often too lengthy for inclusion in a mere 6 pages of BE and he leaps from topic to topic according to whatever strikes his fancy. But because his errors are so numerous, I just can't resist the opportunities he provides. Having said that, DA begins his letter by quoting me as having said to him in Issue 168, "I get the last word in an individual issue, since I don't know of any other practical way it can be done, do you?" He replies--Ed.),

Sure. Do it the same way loads of editors have done with my frequently hostile letters to them. Print it and make no response. Highly practical. Not merely as emotionally satisfying or fun, but entirely practical.

Editors Response to Letter #750 (Part a)

Oh! I see. I'm supposed to turn the publication over to you and provide pages of unhindered, uncorrected, unassailed airtime. You'd like that wouldn't you. Well you have come to the wrong forum for that scenario my friend. In case you have not noticed, this periodical is centered around dialogue, debate, correspondence and interaction, not unchecked propaganda. If other editors have given you the kind of hearing you described, which I doubt, then that is their error to make. Perhaps they did not have a reply or did not consider your points worth replying to. In any event, we have no intention of following suit, because we most assuredly do have potent responses to every argument you have submitted.

Imagine what would happen if you gained the kind of access you seek. Every critic would be clamoring for the same treatment and I would end up publishing issue after issue of my critics assertions. In effect, BE would become little more than a platform for the very ideology it is dedicated to exposing and refuting.

You already receive 100 times the amount of exposure I am allotted by all of the Christian (biblical) publications in the nation combined. I would be delighted were I permitted to insert the amount of material in my opponents publications that people like you are allocated in BE. The percentages aren't even remotely comparable. And you have the chutzpah to insidiously attribute restrictions on free speech by me.

You say, "Highly practical." Of course! Highly practical for you. That way you could implant even more inducement while being less concerned with accuracy. Apparently your lethargic propensities have prompted you to favor the simple expedient of co-opting your opponents publication rather than creating one of your own.

Letter #750 Continues (Part b)

When I point out that errors in the KJV have been copied in many successors, you make the extravagant claim that I am saying "...the Greek and Hebraic translators of modern versions agreeing with the KJV are incompetent". Not at all. I am saying they are producing flawed text, which is what you expect of any mortal in any case. They may be incompetent, competent but interested in other goals than a perfect text (cheapness, superior readability..), or other.

Editors Response to Letter #750 (Part b)

The only extravagance involved is your attempt to restrict incompetence to the ability to translate only. You admit they are producing flawed text but say they are competent because they are doing so intentionally in order to make the text cheaper, more readable, etc. Regardless of what their motives are, be they intentional or the result of inadequate mastery of the material, if the text is flawed, if the text is inaccurate, if the text conveys an erroneous impression, then you are saying they are incompetent translators.

The key word is "flawed" and you just admitted, "I am saying they are producing flawed text." Whether it is cheaper or more readable is of no consequence once you admit it is flawed. Cheaper and more readable is not synonymous with being flawed.

Letter #750 Continues (Part c)

(In the same issue said to DA, "To all those inclined to attack future issues of BE say, Please read our back issues first...." DA now replies by saying--Ed.), Given you are well past 150 issues, that would be difficult, and not cheap either (maybe 1000 pages and $160). If you expect us to take such advice, you had best start referring to the particular issue(s) that cover the point in question.

Editors Response to Letter #750 (Part c)

Like all those indoctrinated into Christianity, you look for the kind of ulterior motives that are so prominent within those victimized by your own ideology. If I was as mercenary as you imply, do you think I would post all of my back issues on a web site? They are free for all to view and if you are too lazy to learn how to navigate the Internet, then don't come moaning to me, and don't try to con your readers into believing I am purposely restricting your access to information in order to feather my own nest.

As far as reading my back issues is concerned you employed the kind of subtle deception that is so endemic to biblicists in general and your line of argumentation in particular. There were no particular points at issue when I said the following (verbatim), "I am increasingly encountering defenders of the Bible who have not read BE over the years and are merely revivifying arguments that have long since been buried. To all those inclined to attack future issues of BE I say, Please read our back issues first before you pick up the poisoned pointed pen to ride out and fight for Jesus." In other words, I was advising you and all of your compatriots to read all of our back issues before embarking upon forays into hinterlands unknown, since a wise program of that nature would forestall hundreds of points you are poised to make or may be so inclined to utter in the future. To me that was excellent advice. Do your homework before you begin to speak about that which you have not properly researched. In other words, read our back issues before you begin to complain about what is contained therein or allege they lack an effective response to your criticisms. If you were really as concerned with finding the truth as you pretend, you would read first and write later.

Even if a particular point had been under discussion, you had no solid grounds for saying, "you had best start referring to the particular issue(s) that cover the point in question." In other words, I not only wrote the material for you but now I am supposed to go back through my issues and do your research. You remind me of a student I had years ago. He wanted to know where he could find some information on Egypt. When I said that kind of data can be found in the Encyclopedia, he wanted to know where in the book specifically. He not only wanted me to tell him where the data could be found but to look it up for him as well. In effect, he wanted me to do some of his basic work.

Even if were willing to do this kind of research, I do not have the time or the staff that would be required. Maybe you'd like to volunteer?

Letter #750 Continues (Part d)

[After citing Ezek. 30:12 ("And I will make the rivers of Egypt dry") in the 168th issue, I asked, "What rivers are in Egypt other than the Nile?"--DA now wishes to add to his earlier reply--Ed.],

Ezek. 30:12 says "rivers", or maybe "river", or "streams", or... Then there is the definition of "river" to consider. (By the way, my Webster's main definition of "river" is "a natural stream of water bigger than a creek and emptying into an ocean...") which would clearly make each branch of the Nile, or other delta a separate river. Where is the contradiction?

Editors Response to Letter #750 (Part d)

This reply proves that you ignored my advice and did not read our back issues, because this topic was addressed long ago. I am not going to keep reinventing the wheel. As I said before, biblicists are not going to be allowed to have many versions of each verse from which they can draw as expediency dictates. You, not I, are going to have to get anchored on one version of each verse, and if you think I am going to accept scores of versions of each and allow you to leap from one to the other as circumstances require, then you're engaged in reverie.

You stated, "Ezek. 30:12 says rivers, or maybe river, or streams, or..." What kind of a comment is that? You are defending a verse while admitting you don't even know what it says. That's anile! Where did you get these three words? From 3 different manuscripts? So which is correct. What does the real Bible say? You admit you don't know and this situation could be applied to hundreds of verses. Apparently you don't realize you are destroying your own Book. You can't tell me what it says for sure, but you are positive it's not contradictory. How could you possibly know that until you can produce the originals which is impossible. I, on the other hand, have no problem producing contradictions because they are written on the pages before me. You are attributing perfection to a phantom, while I am proving imperfection in a reality.

Moreover, you can't even find an accurate Webster's Dictionary, since it would be ridiculous to define a river as "a natural stream of water bigger than a creek and emptying into an ocean." Where on earth did you find that book? Would you be so gracious as to tell me what oceans the Jordan River, the Saskatchewan River, the Volga, the Don, and the Dnieper empty into. In Europe I could also mention the Po, the Rhone, or the Danube. Do have any idea how many rivers in Canada empty into lakes. I taught geography years ago and I don't think I have to tell you what grade you would have received if you had made that uneducated (I'm tempted to say ignorant) comment in my class.

Letter #750 Continues (Part e)

(DA quotes me as having said to him in Letter #168, "Are you telling me each branch of that delta is a separate river? If so give me the names of all these rivers. I'm sure people living in the delta would like them as well." DA now replies with--Ed.),

They already have them. Names like West Branch, North Branch, Lower Branch, X City Branch, etc. are common. You would need to go to the delta in question, or to a good mapmaker, to find all these names, but the branches of a river are routinely named, and well known to the locals.

It was all I could do to restrain my laughter with this reply DA. You refuted your own argument. You started out to prove many rivers were involved and then clumsily fell into a tar pit and exposed your own duplicity by stating (verbatim), "the branches of a river." You just admitted only one river is involved. "A" river. So all your talk about branches just fell off the tree.

I don't know of any river in the world with branches of its delta classified as separate rivers, and that includes the Mekong, the Amazon, the Ganges, and the Nile. Branches of a river are no more separate rivers than branches or limbs of my body are separate people. Apparently desperation is setting in because your whole line of defense is vacuous and vividly reveals why I would not want my children getting anywhere near a philosophy that produces such intractable ideologues. (To Be Concluded Next Month)

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #751 from DM of Corpus Christi, Texas

Since know you are a busy man, I will keep this letter brief. I am writing to let you know that I am a huge fan of your television show. Finally we have someone who isn't afraid to reveal exactly what the Bible actually does say. I watch your program whenever possible, but unfortunately it doesn't air with any regular consistency in my area.

The other purpose of this letter is to ask if there are any publications interested parties can subscribe to that you publish, or if not, are any that you could recommend? In closing I want to offer you congratulations for a job very well done. Many thanks! Keep up the good work!

Editors Response to Letter #751

You comments are only too kind and clearly demonstrate the importance of having our TV programs played throughout the nation. EB in Corpus Christi, Texas is doing an excellent job of getting them aired on his local station and nothing proves this better than the number of inquiries we are getting from that area of Texas. We will send you a free list of our materials.

Letter #752 from MU of Corpus Christi, Texas

Dear Mr. McKinsey. I have watched with interest your program on the local TV. I am interested in knowing more about your in-depth research for apparent contradictions in the Holy Bible. Please mail me your free literature. Thank you for your cooperation.

Editors Response to Letter #752

Dear MU. Yours is just another letter testifying to the great job EB is doing in getting our programs aired in the Corpus Christ area. I even had a fellow employee tell me her son in the military saw our program while stationed in Corpus Christi. EB is proving it can be done, if the will is there, without negative results.

Letter #753 from Anonymous

I purchased your book quite a while ago, and found it well worth the price tag. It is literally jammed packed with more than enough information to blow away even the Pope!

Anyway, my main point is this. I purchased an expensive $55 NIV study bible. As I was reading it, a thought hit me. What a great idea it would be to have an 'Atheist Study Bible'; a standard issue KJV bible with running side bar commentary. I next thought, what better man to write it than Mr. McKinsey! Imagine the debating power one would possess with arguments and cross-references attached to each objectionable quote! Well, it's a suggestion anyway.

Editors Response to Letter #753

Thanks for your compliment. As far as issuing a critical study Bible from BE's perspective is concerned, I have pondered that idea on several occasions, but each quickly faded when I contemplated the problems associated with having it published.

In fact, I have considered even more often the possibility of publishing all five of my voluminous and exhaustive notebooks in one single tome. It would be an invaluable aid to those seeking a ready source of reference material for quick queries, replies, and refutations during biblical encounters. Instead of being in narrative form, which involves some digging, it would be organized in a manner similar to that of a dictionary. The plot would be thin but the facts thick. You would only have to look up any topic that interests you and all of the needed verses would be at your fingertips.

The contents could even be arranged in order of potency which would be of tremendous aid to biblical critics and freethinkers.

A national periodical focusing on Biblical errors, contradictions, and fallacies, while providing a hearing for apologists

REVIEW

THE CHRIST (Part 1)

One of the most potent antibiblical books in the pantheon of anti-religious literature, one to which we have referred on numerous occasions, is entitled The Christ by John Remsberg. Besides exposing a vast array of errors, contradictions and fallacies in the books of the NT, another section devoted to an analysis of the parallels between the lives of Jesus and other religious figures in history is included as well. Two of the most intriguing, if not revealing, comparisons are those between Jesus on the one hand and Krishna and Buddha on the other. Although we do not normally focus on extrabiblical material, digressions are occasionally in order, as we noted in our discussions of the Koran and the Book of Mormon. In addition to the prodigious quantity of internal biblical conflicts, the following extrabiblical historical considerations should also give biblicists strong reason to pause and think. Parallels between the lives of Krishna, Buddha, and Jesus are strong testimony, indeed, to the effect that Jesus is nothing more than another pseudo-savior, deserving no more respect than his predecessors.

Beginning on page 500 Remsberg says that according to mythology, "Krishna was the eighth Vatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu, one of the Hindoo Trinity. In this incarnation Vishnu, it is said, appeared in all the fullness of his power and glory. His mother was Devaki. He is believed to be an historical character, but his real history, like that of Jesus, is almost entirely obscured by myths. He lived from 900 to 1,200 years before the Christian era. The story of his life is to be found in the Bhagavat.....

The points of resemblance between Krishna and Christ that have been printed would fill a volume. Some of these are apocryphal, and not confirmed by the canonical scriptures of India. The limits of this chapter preclude an extended list even of the undoubtedly genuine. I shall confine myself chiefly to a presentation of the most important ones relating to their births.

These, according to the Christian translator of the Bhagavat, Rev. Thomas Maurice, are as follows:

- (1) Both were miraculously conceived;*
- (2) Both were divine incarnations;*
- (3) Both were of royal descent;*

- (4) Devatas or angels sang songs of praise at the birth of each;
- (5) Both were visited by neighboring shepherds;
- (6) In both cases the reigning monarch, fearing he would be supplanted in his kingdom by the divine child, sought to destroy him;
- (7) Both were saved by friends who fled with them in the night to distant countries;
- (8) And foiled in their attempts to discover the babes, both of the babes kings issued decrees that all the infants should be put to death."

Remsberg goes on to say that, "The subsequent careers of these deities are also analogous in many respects. Their missions were the same--the salvation of mankind. Both performed miracles--healed the sick and raised the dead. Both died for man by man. There is a tradition, though not to be found in the Hindoo scriptures, that Krishna, like Christ, was crucified.

Various incidents recorded in the life of Christ were doubtless suggested by similar incidents in the life of Krishna. He washed the feet of his disciples because Krishna had washed the feet of the Brahmins. He taught his disciples the possibility of moving a mountain, because Krishna, to protect his worshipers from the wrath of Indra, raised Mount Goverdhen above them...."

Remsberg continues on page 502 by saying, "McClintock and Strongs Cyclopedia notes the following events in the history of Krishna which correspond with those related of Christ: That he was miraculously born at midnight of a human mother, and saluted by a chorus of Devatas (angels); that he was cradled among cowherds,...he was persecuted by the giant Kansa, and saved by his mothers flight; the miracles with which his life abounds, among which were the raising of the dead and the cleansing of the leprous.

The celebrated missionary and traveler, Pere Huc, who made a journey of several thousand miles through China and Thibet, says: 'If we addressed a Mogul or Thibetan with this question, Who is Krishna? The reply was instantly, The savior of men.'

'All that converting the Hindus to Christianity does for them, says Robert Cheyne, is to change the object of worship from Krishna to Christ.'

Of Krishna's gospel, the Bhagavad-Gita, Appleton's Cyclopedia says, 'Its correspondence with the New Testament is indeed striking'."

Remsberg continues by saying, "Its admitted by Christian scholars that Krishna lived many centuries before Christ. To admit the priority of the Krishna legends is to deny, to this extent, the originality of the Gospels. In order to break the force of the logical conclusion to be drawn from this, some argue that while Krishna himself antedated Christ, the legends concerning him are of later origin and borrowed from the Evangelists. Regarding this contention Judge Waite, in his History of the Christian Religion says, 'Here then, we have the older religion and the older god. This, in the absence of any evidence on the other side, ought to settle the question. To assume without evidence that the older religion has been interpolated from the later, and that the legends of the older hero have been made to conform to the history of a later character, is worse than illogical--it is absurd'."

Remsberg continues by quoting Sir William Jones, one of the best Christian authorities on Sanskrit literature, and the translator of the Bhagavad-Gita who says, "That the name of Krishna, and the general outline of his history were long anterior to the birth of our Savior, and probably to the time of Homer, we know very certainly." (Asiatic Researches, Vol. 1, page 254).

And Remsberg concludes by saying, "The parallels between Krishna and Christ to be found in the Hindoo scriptures and the Christian gospels are too numerous and too exact to be accidental. The legends of the one were borrowed from the other." And it does not require vast intellect to determine who borrowed from whom. Next months issue will conclude our discussion of the striking similarity between the lives of Jesus and prior alleged religious saviors.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #750 from DA Continues from last month. (Part f)

The essential of a contradiction is A, Not A. But if you cant say what A is, how can you expose any contradictions? So you are under the burden of proving that Ezek. 30:12 says rivers, and that rivers can not be used to describe the branches in a major river delta.

Editors Response to Letter #750 (Part f)

You state, "If you can't say what A is, how can you expose any contradictions?" Now lets don't be coy by trying to shift the burden of proof with respect to all of scripture, DA, because that is the import of your contention. It's your book not mine. You and your compatriots present me with a version of an original writing, which no one has ever seen and many doubt ever existed, and then ask me to prove it has errors and contradictions. When I provide literally thousands of contradictions and fallacies, such as your rivers situation, which was addressed last month, you say that can not prove that that is what the original says. But I am under no obligation to do so. Quite the contrary, you are the one required to prove the original has something else. And until you do, the dilemmas remain. How do you know that that is not what the alleged original says? That's what the manuscripts have. Certainly that's what is to be found in the King James Version of Ezek. 30:12. You say, "But if you cant say what A is..." I am not the one who can't say what A is; you are. You are the one casting doubt on what lies in front of us, not I. You are the one insinuating there has been an inaccurate translation. You are the one implying that a more accurate translation could have been made. You are the one implying the manuscripts from which the version in front of us were derived are inaccurate and that scholars didn't translate correctly, you who admit you can't even read or write either Hebrew or Greek.

Those who adopt your defense can't seem to realize that in their irrational exuberance to save the Bible they have only succeeded in destroying its credibility by bringing into question all of scripture. Operating according to your theory biblicalists can never be sure any verse is an accurate translation of the alleged original. And if that can't be known for certain, how can they be sure they are reading God's word. The answer is that they can't.

Yet, despite these considerations you try to assure believers that there is nothing to worry about with respect to scripture by saying in the next part,

Letter #750 Continues (Part g)

Everybody agrees on 99% of the text. Only nit pickers (like us) worry about the rest.

Editors Response to Letter #750 (Part g)

Now, wait a minute! You just stated in regard to our rivers contradiction, which represents thousands of contradictions, that a contradiction can't be proven because the original might have said something else and eliminated the contradiction. Don't you realize that that is only another way of saying the entire book is suspect because there is no way of knowing for sure what the original says.

Now you are reversing thrusts and saying "Everybody agrees on 99% of the text." What text? The text to be found in the various manuscripts? Hardly! The text to be found in the various versions? Don't be absurd. You obviously did not read all of the clashes between versions noted in some of my earlier issues, especially issues 66 through 70.

If, on the other hand, you are alleging the originals are without contradictions, then your dilemma becomes even more pronounced. How can you possibly be sure of what the alleged original said when you have never seen it and the original no longer exists, assuming it ever did. Moreover, you stated earlier, "If you cant say what A is," and you are alleging you can't. Remember, A can represent any verse in scripture.

If Scripture could speak it would no doubt say, "With friends like you who needs enemies?" In an attempt to make it look as if critics like me can't pin anything down with certainty because the original is unavailable, apologists like you don't realize you have unwittingly turned all of scripture into a nebulous mush that is about as solid as jello in an earthquake. If can't be sure of the word "rivers" and thousands of other words and phrases, then you can't be sure of Scripture, period. Your loss is greater than mine, because I lost an argument while you lost the Bible. Your attempt to salvage Scripture reminds me of what they said regarding the village of Ben Suc in Vietnam. It had to be destroyed in order to be saved.

Letter #750 Continues (Part h)

(Continuing to reply to my comments on his letter in Issue #168 DA says--Ed), Amazing how you can misquote me right after quoting me correctly. I make the obvious statement that the Septuagint is an eyewitness to Biblical events BY COMPARISON to the KJV, which you quote and then you start accusing me of saying the Septuagint was an eyewitness. Simple nonsense. The Septuagint was a, say, 5th hand witness while the KJV was 10th hand. & by comparison to the KJV, the Septuagint is an eyewitness. That the Septuagint concerned events centuries or millennium before it is irrelevant here. Obvious logic that even you ought to see....

Editors Response to Letter #750 (Part h)

You ought to play poker DA, since you can engage in more bluffs than any biblicist I know. You work on the theory that if you talk definitively and authoritatively with intimidating terminology, the opposition will back down under the mistaken assumption that they are in over their heads and you are more knowledgeable than they. Whenever your ego is involved you frenetically rustle up a ruse internally, while trying to maintain an aura of confidence, serenity, and control externally.

Lets get the facts straight. In Issue #168 you stated (verbatim), "The Septuagint is, however, over 1500 years older than the KJV (maybe 250 B.C.), making it an eyewitness by comparison." To that I replied, "You refer to the Septuagint as being an eyewitness by comparison. Oh my goodness! Have you no sense of historical perspective and contemporaneous events? There are more years between the Septuagint and the events related by it in Genesis than there are between the Septuagint and the King James Version. You want people to believe the Septuagint is nearly an eyewitness to the The Creation Myth, the Adam and Eve tale, the Flood, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, etc.? Where on earth did you learn your biblical history? I don't even know of any fundamentalist seminaries that are that far off base."

This reply instigated your above comment in which you allege that was accusing you of "saying the Septuagint was an eyewitness," which you characterize as engaging in "Simple nonsense." For you, of all people, to make reference to simple nonsense is vapid, indeed, in light of the fact that you are the one who could do with some assistance in the logic department! What did I say? Did you read closely or with your usual superficial glance? I said (verbatim) "You want people to believe the Septuagint is nearly an eyewitness...." Notice I said NEARLY. did not say you claimed the Septuagint was an eyewitness.

Secondly, you say, "The Septuagint was a, say, 5th hand witness while the KJV was 10th hand. & by comparison to the KJV, the Septuagint is an eyewitness." The Septuagint was not an eyewitness, either directly or indirectly, or by comparison to anything. It either was an eyewitness or it wasn't. And the fact is that it was not. Its analogous to being pregnant. You either are or you aren't; you cant be partially pregnant. You are trying to surreptitiously attribute an eyewitness stature to the Septuagint that it simply does not merit.

Thirdly, you say, "That the Septuagint concerned events centuries or millennium before it is irrelevant here." Wrong again! It certainly is relevant. You only wish it weren't. Time frames are quite relevant because they demonstrate conclusively that the the Septuagint does not have this quasi-eyewitness status which you feel its due.

Letter #750 Continues (Part i)

(In the 168th issue I said to DA, "You say 'The Septuagint is, however, over 1500 years older than the KJV.' That's supposed to prove it is more accurate? Following that logic the King James Version should blow away all these modern versions because its over 300 years older than they are. It is over 300 years closer to the actual events." DA now says--Ed.),

Nor will it do to try to say that since the Septuagint is superior to the KJV for being closer to the event, the KJV ought to be superior to modern versions since it is older than they are. The modern versions are based on 6th and 7th hand witnesses and are thus in effect perhaps a thousand years older than the KJV we had described as a 10th hand witness.

Editors Response to Letter #750 (Part i)

First, you say "we" had described the KJV "as a 10th hand witness" Other than yourself, who is this we to whom you are referring? I certainly hope you are not including me. From whence came that bizarre figure? Some esoteric tome?

Second, how do you know modern versions are based on 6th and 7th hand witnesses and where did you get those numbers? I have never seen them in the literature either.

Third, the word "perhaps" shows you are guessing and remember what I said recently about the book Who Moved the Stone regarding employment of words like "probably" and "perhaps"?

Fourth and finally, you act as if the KJV is self-contained and derived from nothing. In fact, it is based upon prior manuscripts. And how do you know those OT writings upon which it is based are not older than the manuscripts upon which the modern versions are founded? In fact, how do you know they are not older than the Septuagint and the manuscripts from which it is derived, which would all but decimate your entire theory.

Letter #750 Concludes (Part i)

(In the 168th issue I noted the contradiction between 2 Kings 8:26 which says Ahaziah began to rule at age 22 and 2 Chron. 22:2 which says he was 42. DA now says--Ed.),

You run through some possibilities a) 42 correct and 22 wrong, b) 22 correct and 44 (sic) wrong, and c) both say 22 or 42 in the original, to which you say I have no way to prove either figure. Quite the contrary. Second Chron. 21:5 and 20 both say Joram, Ahaziahs father died at age 40, as does 2 Kings 8:17. A son older than the father is something we can best reserve for science fiction, so we can throw out 42.

Jacob Myers in the 2 Chronicles volume of the Anchor Bible (p. 125) tells us "The chief LXX witnesses have '20', while there is some minor support for '22', which may be due to the influence of the Masoretic Text (MT) of 2 Kings 8:26. The MT of Chronicles may represent the conflation of two traditions and exhibits a striking example of the effort to preserve two divergent traditions. Originally the numbers were kept separate, e.g., 20 or 22, and only later added together." Which meant that the correct answer was d) and that 2 Chronicles 22:2 did not say 42 in the original. 42 is an error in the translation, not in the bible.

Editors Concluding Response to Letter #750 (Part j)

The major error involved would not be with the translation but with those who actually took your rationalizations to heart.

First, since when did Jacob Myers and the Anchor Bible become the final authority? Just because Myers says it, that is sufficient? Apparently you have more than one god.

Second, Myers admits he is guessing because he says, "The MT of Chronicles may represent the conflation of two traditions." Use of the word "may" proves as much. Consequently, when he says, "Originally the numbers were kept separate, e.g., 20 or 22, and only later added together," he is engaged in conjecture. He also uses the word "may" with respect to the influence of the Masoretic Text (MT) of 2 Kings 8:26. Again, recall what said in regard to Who Moved the Stone and all its suppositions?

Third, you say, "42 is an error in the translation, not in the bible." You don't know that. Now you're guessing. Have you ever seen the originals? No. Do you know of anyone who has? No. Do you have any writing that can definitely and beyond question be proven to be an exact replica of the original? No. Of course not. In other words, you don't have much of anything other than faith and prayer, and we all know how demonstrable they are.

Fourth, you don't seem to realize that the Septuagint, in which you place so much reliance, is a translation, a version, just like the KJV and scores of others and is subject to all the aches and pains associated with every work claiming to be an accurate reproduction of the alleged original. Its not the final authority, its not divinely inspired, and its not inerrant.

And finally, you quote Myers as saying, "The chief LXX witnesses have '20', while there is some minor support for '22',...." Good grief! Have you no sense of logic? You are unwittingly discrediting your own argument. You admit "The chief LXX witnesses have '20', while there is some minor support for '22', as opposed to "20," which strongly implies the correct number is neither 22 nor 42; its 20.

You also say, "Which meant that the correct answer was d)" but you fail to clarify what you mean by d). I did not have d) as an option. If you meant to say b), then, as said, you debunked your own argument by quoting Myers.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #754 from Louis W. Cable of Lufkin, Texas

Dear Dennis. I thoroughly enjoy your critical analyses of the works of Christian apologists. These critiques are indeed devastating, and they give freethinkers some very potent ammunition for rebutting Bible thumpers. I grew up with these types and know them well. Some of your subscribers may not have had the dubious benefit of that experience. If ever you have met a true Bible believer you couldn't help but notice the air of self-righteousness they so arrogantly display. His way, he will tell you, is the only way; his truth is the only truth; his life is the only life worth living. Everyone who does not agree with him is doomed. Isaiah was surely speaking of these people when he said in 5:21, "Woe unto those who are wise in their own eyes, and clever in their own sight."

In BE #176 you critiqued The Case of Jesus the Messiah by the apologists Ankerberg, Weldon, and Kaiser. Once again you demolished bogus claims of prophecy fulfillment. However, the last paragraph was disappointing; you were much too generous. Ankerberg is, in my opinion, a charlatan. He has (or at one time had) a TV show in which he purported to give equal time to those in disagreement with his claim of Bible inerrancy. The show is not shown live. It is taped for later presentation. Despite his claim of impartiality, Ankerberg, or someone on his staff, apparently edits the tapes to show his opponents in an unfavorable light. He and his cohorts always 'win.'

P.S. If you print this letter, please give my full name, Thanks

Editors Response to Letter #754

Louis. In one of our issues years ago I made essentially the same point with respect to editing by the programs creators and was sent a letter from the shows producer assuring me censorship did not occur. Still, I have no doubt that their ability to edit every program all but guarantees a more favorable outcome from their perspective than would otherwise be the case.

Several years before BE appeared, I called the producer and challenged the shows objectivity. All I can remember with respect to the specifics of our conversation, other than its intensity, is that when I mentioned the accuracy of Robert Ingersoll, the producer immediately alleged Ingersoll was "full of prunes." That's a direct quote. I had to muster every ounce of self-restraint in my repertoire in order not to tell him what the Bible was full of.

Letter #755 from JU of Dewey, Arizona

Dear Friends. I was delighted to discover a television program on our local Prescott channel 7 that discussed Biblical Errancy. I live in a fairly conservative community and find that I am overwhelmed by the continuous bible thumping from the right wing Christian religious groups. One particularly vehement group is the "Potters House" cult that has infiltrated our school board and threatens to undermine the whole school system.

I am writing you to get information or a list of sources so can gather ammunition in the form of good information to strike back against these fanatics. Any information you can provide will be appreciated. If you have an Internet web site or if there are web sites that have discussions about Biblical Errancy, let me know that too. Thank you.

Dear JU. Thanks for your compliments and rest assured the entire anti-religious community knows how you feel. Most of us are convinced that we not only live in the Bible Belt but on its buckle.

As far as web sites are concerned you can read nearly all of Biblical Errancy's back issues at: <http://members.aol.com/ckbloomfld>. And we will be glad to send you a free list of materials we have available. If you devour everything contained therein, you should be well equipped to cope with practically any biblicist you may encounter.

Letter #756 from KB of Los Angeles, California

Dear Dennis. BE#177 arrived Friday, Sept. 5. Those items in NBs letter (#743) pertaining to "In God We Trust" on our monies and "under God" in the pledge of allegiance are things that should be committed to memory by freethinkers of every stripe. I find myself having to explain why I put black lines through the letters on the backsides of my paper currency. I know that am putting the idea into someone's mind that it wasn't "always there," especially those born after 1955.

Regarding the tapes of your programs locally, they (programs 9 through 16) are in the hands of Verdugo Hills Cable (now a branch of Media One). When left them in the middle of last month, the engineer there did not have an immediately available time for them, but he said he would book them in as soon as he could find the slot...

#177 arrived with one of those postal service bar codes pasted across the text above the line on the mailing side. If this is happening generally, it might help if you had the columns on page 6 about two lines shorter. See the enclosed copy. I used a mirror to read what had come off on the back of the P.O.s slip, rewrote it, and will paste it over the damage.

Keep up the good work and let me know when you have additional (programs 17 and beyond) ready....

Editors Response to Letter #756

Dear KB. We've finally completed all 100 recordings after nearly four years of effort. Every edition of our TV program, BIBLICAL ERRANCY COMMENTARY, is now available and we hope you will play the entire series as soon as practical. Thanks for the aid.

As far as bar codes are concerned, you are not the only person who has had one posted over the final lines on the 6th page. Within the last several months we have received the same grievance from others. I apologize for putting too much writing on the last page and will try to rectify the situation.

Letter #757 from JB of Mesquite, Texas

Do you distribute any tracts. I recently became an unbeliever through my own study of the Bible. However, I would have become an unbeliever much sooner if I had been exposed to the kind of material you publish. If you have anything available in tract format, it will help me to start many believers down the road of unbelief. During 23 years of believing, I had never before come across any refutations of the Bible that I couldn't dismiss out of hand, because the evangelical world view is remarkably impervious. However, when I discovered on my own that biblical inerrancy is untrue, the very foundation of my world view was undermined and no longer impervious to reason. Many (most?) believers will never recognize biblical errancy on their own, and I believe that some of your material in tract format can give them the leg-up they need to climb out of the pit of irrationality they now obviously dwell in.

Editors Response to Letter #757

A cardinal principle upon which our philosophy and this publication rests is that freethinkers must first knock the props out from under the biblical superstructure before biblicists are going to seriously weigh and contemplate another world view. You have only succeeded in buttressing that premise. For some reason or another the full import of what you are alleging, JB, just doesn't register with thousands of freethinkers. I have made this point repeatedly, but the latter's adherence to the externals of court battles, legal briefs, letters to the editor, appeals to the Constitution, citations from the writings of the founding fathers, invocations of the First Amendment, scientific evidence, exposures of religious history, comparisons to other religions, historical discoveries, etc. is all but intractable. They just don't comprehend the full import of your comments.

Freethinkers also seem oblivious to the full implications of your assertion "that you would have become an unbeliever much sooner if I had been exposed to the kind of material you publish." Instead of realizing biblicists are going to say, "I don't care what kind of extrabiblical evidence you have; if it contradicts the Bible then it has to be false because the Bible is the word of God and what you have is not," they seem intent on pursuing an anemic strategy that is plagued by a history of impotence and failure. Their tactics are not unimportant; just less important in so far as combating our main opposition is concerned.

Because our strategies are clearly in concert, you should find our materials to be of great assistance. We have two tracts in particular, each of which asks biblicists to confront over 20 key questions in regard to Jesus and the Bible. Hopefully you will be able to distribute them in abundance.

Letter #758 from GL via email

Dennis. I just wanted to say thank you for all the information that you have made available. I was involved with a church, born again, and accepted Jesus as my savior, and let me tell you I had questions that would come up when I read the bible and was given some answers that I just could not understand. And that's if I even asked them because was I afraid that was questioning the validity of "the word of god." I have found from my experience that Christianity is based on one thing and one thing only and that is fear. That is what gets people into it and that is what keeps people in it. People are too afraid to question their beliefs because of fear of punishment, even when they have valid doubts. I was one of them. I just want to say how thankful I am that you created your web site. Keep up the great work.

THE CHRIST (Part 2)

Last month's issue discussed the degree to which the lives of Jesus and Krishna are identical as revealed in The Christ by John Remsberg. Remsberg clearly demonstrates that the comparison is even more applicable when the life of Jesus is correlated with that of Buddha. On page 370 he states, "The word Buddha, like the word Christ, is not a name, but a title. It means 'the enlightened one'. The name for this religious founder was Siddhartha Gautama. He was born about 643 B.C, and died 563 B.C. (Note well that that is long before the birth of Jesus--Ed.). His mother, Mahamaya, was a virgin. Dean Milman, in his History of Christianity, says, 'Buddha, according to a tradition known in the West, was born of a virgin' (Vol. I, p. 99). Devaki (the mother of Krishna), Mary, and Mahamaya, all gave birth to their children among strangers.... The 'Tripitaka', the principal Bible of the Buddhists, containing the history of the teachings of Buddha, is a collection of books written in the centuries immediately following Buddha. The canon was finally determined at the Council of Pataliputra, held under the auspices of the Emperor Asoka the Great, 244 B.C., more than 600 years before the Christian canon was established....

Buddha was 'about 30 years old' when he began his ministry (as was Jesus allegedly--Ed.). He fasted 'seven times seven nights and days'. He had a 'band of disciples' who accompanied him. He traveled from place to place and 'preached to large multitudes'. Bishop Bigandet calls his first sermon the 'Sermon on the Mount'. At his Renunciation 'he forsook father and mother, wife and child'. His mission was 'to establish the kingdom of righteousness'. 'Buddha', says Max Mueller, 'promised salvation to all; and he commanded his disciples to preach his doctrine in all places and to all men'....

Buddha formulated the following commandments. 'Not to kill; not to steal; not to lie; not to commit adultery; not to use strong drink'. Christ said, 'Thou knowest the commandments: do not commit adultery; do not kill; do not steal; do not bear false witness; honor thy father and thy mother' (Luke 18:20). Christ ignored the Decalogue of Moses and, like Buddha, presented a pentade which, with the exception of one commandment, is the same as that of Buddha.

Prof. Seydel, of the University of Leipzig, points out 50 analogies between Christianity and Buddhism. Dr. Schleiden calls attention to over 100. Baron Hiarden-

Hickey says: 'Countless analogies exist between Buddhistic and Christian legends--analogies so striking that they forcibly prove to an impartial mind that a common origin must necessarily be given to the teachings of Sakay-Muni (Buddha--Ed.) and those of Jesus. Concerning the biographical accounts of the two religious teachers Harden-Hickey says, 'One account must necessarily be a copy of the other, and since the Buddhist biographer, living long before the birth of Christ, could not have borrowed from the Christian one, the plain inference is that the early creed-mongers of Alexandria were guilty of plagiarism'.'

The following are some of the parallels presented by this writer.

At this point Remsberg lists comparisons between the lives of Jesus and Buddha that should be brought to the attention of every Christian who ever lived. "Both have genealogies tracing their descent from ancestral kings. Both were born of virgin mothers. The conception of each was announced by a divine messenger. The hymns uttered at the two annunciations resemble each other. Both were visited by wise men who brought them gifts. Both were presented in the temple. The aged Simeon of one account corresponds to the aged Asita of the other. As 'the child (Jesus) grew and waxed strong in spirit' so 'the child (Sakay-Muni) waxed and increased in strength.' Both in childhood discoursed before teachers. Both fasted in the wilderness. Both were tempted. Angels or devatas ministered to each. Buddha bathed in the Narajana, and Christ was baptized in the Jordan. The mission of each was proclaimed by a voice from Heaven. Both performed miracles. Both sent out disciples to propagate their faiths. In calling their disciples the command of each was, 'Follow me.' Buddha preached on the Holy Hill, and Christ delivered his sermon on the Mount. The phraseology of the sermons of Buddha and the sermon ascribed to Christ is, in many instances, the same. Both Buddha and Christ compare themselves to husbandmen sowing seed. The story of the prodigal son is found in both Scriptures. The account of the man born blind is common to both. In both the mustard seed is used as a simile for littleness. Christ speaks of 'a foolish man, who built his house upon the sand;' Buddha says, 'Perishable is the city built of sand.' Both speak of 'the rain which falls on the just and the unjust.' The story of the ruler, Nicodemus, who came to Jesus by night has its parallel in the story of the rich man who came to Buddha by night. A converted courtesan, Magdalena, followed Jesus, and a converted courtesan, Ambapali, followed Buddha. There is a legend of a traitor connected with each. Both made triumphal entries, Christ into Jerusalem, and Buddha into Rajagriba. Both proclaimed kingdoms not of this world. The eternal life promised by Christ corresponds to the eternal peace, Nirvana, promised by Buddha. And both religions recognize a trinity." This list could be extended but the point has been made.

...Remsberg quotes Bishop Bigandet further as saying, "In reading the particulars of the life of Buddha it is impossible not to feel reminded of many circumstances relating to our Savior's life as sketched by the evangelists. It may be said in favor of Buddhism that no philosophic-religious system has ever upheld to an equal degree the notions of a savior and deliverer, and the necessity of his mission for procuring the salvation of man...."

The external forms of Christianity, especially Catholic Christianity, are modeled in a large degree after those of Buddhism. Of Northern Buddhism (Lamaism) the Encyclopedia Britannica says: 'Lamaism with its shaven priests, its bells and rosaries, its images and holy water, its popes and bishops, its abbots and monks of many grades, its processions and feast days, its confessional and purgatory, and its worship of the double Virgin, so strongly resembles Roman Catholicism that the first Catholic missionaries thought it must be an imitation by the devil of the religion of Christ.' The central object in every Buddhist temple is an image of Buddha. The central object of every Catholic church is an image of Christ. Holy relics and the veneration of saints are prominent in both. Buddha commanded his disciples to preach his gospel to all men. Christ commanded his disciples to do the same.

...Connected with the triumphs of these religious faiths there is an historical analogy deserving of mention. Three centuries after the time of Buddha, Asoka the Great, emperor of India, became a convert to the Buddhist faith, made it the state religion of the empire, and did more than any other man to secure its supremacy in the East. Three centuries after Christ, Constantine the Great, emperor of Rome, became a convert to the Christian faith, made it the state religion of his empire, and won for it the supremacy of the West."

In concluding his presentation of the similarities between Buddha and Jesus, Remsburg quotes Remusat who says, "Buddhism has been called the Christianity of the East" and then adds the following compelling correction. "It would be more appropriate to call Christianity the Buddhism of the West. Buddha, and not Christ, was the 'Light of Asia.' At this torch Christians lighted their taper and called it 'The Light of the World'."

In light of the fact that Buddha predated Jesus by approximately 600 years, the unavoidable conclusion to be drawn from the parallels between their lives is readily apparent. For obvious reasons, this kind of information is all but non-existent in Christian sermons, schools, literature, media, and other propaganda agencies. After all, Jesus couldn't very well be the unique messiah for all mankind when he is exposed as nothing more than another pretender in a long series of alleged saviors.

DOES THE BIBLE CONTRADICT ITSELF? (Part 1)

One of the more prominent apologetic works is a popular defense of the Bible entitled Does the Bible Contradict Itself? by W. Arndt, professor of New Testament exegesis and hermeneutics at Concordia Seminary in St. Louis, Missouri. To some extent Arndt operates in the tradition of Haley who wrote what is probably the most famous 19th century defense of scripture--Alleged Discrepancies of the Bible. Arndt's answers are often brief while deceptive and superficially persuasive. Only when one disassembles and dissects the relevant data and the accompanying ramifications, assumptions, conjectures, and irrelevancies does reality step from fog to foreground. An extensive, but by no means exhaustive, critique of his techniques and defenses is in order because they represent the kind of strategy employed by many apologists. Some of his more egregious violations of intellectual integrity are the following:

On page 12 Arndt addresses the contradiction between Gen. 25:6 ("But unto the sons of the concubines which Abraham had,....") and Heb. 11:17 ("By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son") by saying, "Abraham has only one son, and he had several sons--both statements are true. ...Isaac was the only son whom Sarah had born to him, the only one who was to be in the direct line of ancestry to the Messiah. Isaac was the only heir of the vast possessions of Abraham. Hence, while it is true that Abraham had sons by concubines, the statement that Isaac was his only son is justified and not in conflict with the passages that speak of Ishmael and the sons of Keturah."

In order to escape this dilemma Arndt arbitrarily injected an unsustainable textual addendum. Nothing is said about Isaac being the only son in "the direct line of ancestry to the Messiah." The text says Isaac is the only begotten son of Abraham, period; it does not say he was the only son in "the direct line of ancestry to the Messiah." That is a gratuitous insertion that is not warranted by Scripture.

The word "begotten" will not save the day because nowhere does Scripture give that term any other meaning than that which can be found in Webster's dictionary, namely, "beget" means: "to be the father or sire of; to procreate; to bring into being or produce." These meanings can be applied to many individuals and do not distinguish Isaac from other OT figures in any meaningful way. Nowhere does Scripture restrict that term to the Messiah generally or Jesus specifically. According to Gen. 5:4 Seth was "begotten" and according to Judges 8:30 seventy sons of Gideon were "begotten". So no special significance can be attached to the word "begotten." If "begotten" means one is in the direct line of ancestry to the Messiah then all 70 of Gideon's sons were in that lineage as well--quite a trick, indeed!

Moving further, on page 17 Arndt confronts the contradiction between Ex. 9:3, 6 ("Behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thy (Egypt's--Ed.) cattle which is in the field, upon the horses, upon the asses, upon the camels, upon the oxen, and upon the sheep; there shall be a very grievous murrain. And all the cattle of Egypt died") and Ex. 14:9 ("But the Egyptians pursued after them, all the horses and chariots of Pharaoh, and his horsemen, and his army, and overtook them encamping by the sea....") by stating, "How could Pharaoh pursue the Israelites with a large army, including horsemen and chariots, if in the plague of which we read in Ex. 9:3, 6 all his horses had died? In answer I beg to submit the following three points: (1) The word "all" in such cases is a relative concept. When a heavy frost in spring shatters the hopes for an abundant fruit crop in a certain locality, I may say the whole crop has been destroyed, despite the fact that a few isolated apples and peaches will appear on the trees. My remark simply states that, generally speaking, there will be no fruit crop, or, in other words, that the fruit which has survived is not worth mentioning. Thus it may have been when a dread murrain overtook the cattle and horses in Egypt. The loss was so general that the animals which remained were very few in number and hardly worth mentioning....."

This explanation is only another way of saying that "all" does not mean all. It means "most" or "nearly all." Are we, or are we not, dealing with God's perfect, inerrant word? According to millions of Christians, we are. If so, then we are not dealing with the linguistic license accorded imperfect human beings in which we know absolutes do not refer to "totality". We are dealing with perfection and perfection allows no imperfections or near misses. This is not a theological game of horseshoes. Long ago I noted that the Bible's propensity for absolutist comments is a weakness of the first magnitude and this is a quintessential example of same. There can be no in-between when you are dealing with perfection and God is perfection by definition. If he wrote it, whatever it may be, then it has to be perfect.

Secondly, if "the animals which remained were very few in number and hardly worth mentioning" then how were the Egyptians able to pursue the Israelites with a force strong enough to pursue hundreds of thousands?

Arndt then proceeds to his next explanation. "(2) Moses indicates in his narrative that the plague affected not all the cattle of the Egyptians, but only those which were in the field (Ex. 9:3). The account then permits us to assume that the horses of Pharaoh which he kept in his forts ready for immediate service escaped the murrain."

It is interesting to note that Arndt qualified his comment with the word "indicates" because he knows as well as I that that is not what the text says occurred. Although the 3rd verse does say, "the hand of the Lord is upon the cattle which is in the field" verse 6 goes much farther by saying "And the Lord did that thing on the morrow, and all the cattle of Egypt died," not just those which were in the field.

Arndt concludes by saying, "(3) The animals belonging to the Israelites were not stricken, as we see from Ex. 9:4, 7. It may be that Pharaoh, immediately after the cessation of the plague, filled the gaps in his supply of war horses by taking as many horses from the Israelites as he could, under some pretext or other." This is nothing more than rampant speculation for which there is not a shred of textual support either. "May be" are hardly the words of sound, proven scholarship. If he is going to stretch events to that degree, why not just say God resupplied the Pharaoh as needed like manna from heaven or hundreds of horses were shipped in from foreign lands. Better yet, why not say new horses sprang from the cells, DNA, and protoplasm of those horses that were killed or God made horses "out of the dust of the ground" like he did Adam? And if you really want to go all out, why not contend aliens from space landed with an ample supply of horses they were willing to loan. The fact that none of this nonsense has any textual backing whatever should be of no consequence. After all, if you are going to let your imagination run wild like a babe in toy land, why impose limits?

One can't help but notice that Arndt failed to employ an excuse that would probably have been seized upon by the more inept biblical defenders. Ex. 9:6 says all the cattle of Egypt died; it did not say all the horses. No doubt some eager defenders would seize upon the distinction made between cattle and horses and allege the former were intended while the latter were not. But that would only prove he is unaware of the fact that the word cattle could be more accurately translated from the Hebrew as livestock, which would include horses. The word "cattle" in Ex. 9:6 comes from the Hebrew word "miqneh" which means "livestock" or "live herds" or "flocks" that are property. Unlike the King James, a sizable number of modern translations are willing to admit as much. The Modern Language, the NIV (fundamentalist), the JB (Catholic), the NAB (Catholic), the NWT, and the NASB all use the word "livestock" rather than the word "cattle" which would include horses as well as cattle, rather than cattle alone. The Good News Bible uses the word animals which is even more encompassing than livestock because that would include pets too. So, the unavoidable conclusion to be drawn from this entire scenario is that all the Pharaohs horses were killed. How, then, could the Pharaohs army have pursued the Israelites on horses and horse-drawn chariots?

On page 20 Arndt attempts to reconcile a contradiction we mentioned long ago with respect to the acts of God. Ex. 20:14 says, "Thou shalt not commit adultery" which contradicts Num. 31:18 in which God says, "All the women children that have not known a man by lying with him keep alive for yourselves." Arndt says, "This pair of passages presents so little difficulty from the point of view of harmonization that it would not have been listed if it were not for the frivolous and unscrupulous use which some unbelieving writers are making of Num. 31:18 in our days. They maintain the order contained in this passage was given so that the immoral desires of the Israelites might be served. If that were true then God would indeed be contradicting Himself.... But is the import of Num. 31:18 correctly given by these scoffers? The passage or the context does not contain one syllable which might justify their interpretation. In raising their charge, they are drawing entirely on their wicked imagination, imputing to God and the leaders of Israel the motives which might have actuated themselves in such a situation."

Apparently working on the theory that the best defense is to seize the offense, Arndt attributes motives to biblical opponents that are designed to gain the upper hand psychologically, even though they are neither provable nor relevant. An alleged "wicked imagination" on the part of biblical critics is not the dilemmas source; logic is. Psychological motives are not what matters; deeds are. The fact is that God ordered men to take women and keep them alive "for yourselves." Arndt contends the text does not justify imputing impure motives to God and the leaders of Israel when there is nothing in the text to prove otherwise. He just assumes out of hand that since god is the perpetrator, the motives must be pure. Judging from an incredibly large number of other Scriptural acts by god, that assumption can hardly be deemed justified. What God ordered is more important than why he ordered it, absent evidence to the contrary. And most assuredly evidence to the contrary is not forthcoming.

Arndt says critics "maintain the order contained in this passage was given so that the immoral desires of the Israelites might be served," when critics are saying nothing of the sort. Who said anything about motives. Critics are not saying anything with respect to why the order was given, since that's not the issue. The fact is that God told men to take women and use them "for themselves." If only one person involved is married, then God is ordering adultery. Why the order was given is of secondary importance.

Arndt says, "The passage or the context does not contain one syllable which might justify their interpretation" when Arndt provides nothing that would justify any other. Essentially, when all the smoke and mirrors are removed, Arndt's argument amounts to nothing more than saying "God wouldn't do something like that. He is too nice a guy. And how do I know he is so pure, because the Bible tells me so." In that case, I'd strongly suggest Arndt reread Scripture, and do so much more closely than was formerly the case, after reading issues 115 through 120 of BE.

Continuing on page 21 Arndt says, "The command of God has its full explanation in the fact that the women mentioned in Num. 31:18 had not been active in seducing the Israelites to participation in the immoral worship of Peor, hence they were permitted to live, although they had to become the slaves of the Israelites....." Arndt tries to attribute decent motives to God by alleging he saved the women from death and consigned them to slavery instead, which is irrelevant. He is trying to shift the focus from adultery to slavery. Whether or not God saved them from death and made them slaves instead is insignificant, especially in light of the fact that the Bible doesn't clarify their slave status one way or the other. The point that counts is that adultery was condoned, indeed commanded, in the process. The fact that they were enslaved rather than killed doesn't exonerate God. It isn't even germane. The fact that God ordered the Israelites to use them in the act of adultery certainly is.

On page 33 Arndt tackles the conflict between 2 Sam. 6:23 ("Therefore Michal, the daughter of Saul, had no child unto the day of her death") and 2 Sam. 21:8 ("But the king took the two sons of Rizpah, the daughter of Aiah, whom she bare unto Saul...and the five sons of Michal, the daughter of Saul, whom she brought up for Adriel, the son of Barzillai...."). He states, "There are two different ways of bringing these two passages into agreement. The holy writer in his statement in 2 Sam. 6:23 may intend to say that Michal had no child in her marriage with David. If we assume this to be his meaning, then all difficulty vanishes." In our discussion of the work entitled Who Moved the Stone by Morison we dwelled at length on the speculative approach to biblical defense and Arndt has again raised its ugly head. "May intend," and "if we assume" are not the words of proven scholarship but more in the tradition of "I only hope so." Arndt is guessing in every respect and just as importantly he is guessing without biblical support. Nothing is said about David or Michal's marriage to David.

Arndt continues by saying, "The other explanation advocated is that we assume Michal in 2 Sam. 21:8 to be a copyists mistake for Merob. If we compare the latter passage with 1 Sam. 18:19 ("And it came to pass at the time when Merab Saul's daughter should have been given to David, that she was given unto Adriel the Meholathite to wife"), we shall see that Merob was the daughter of Saul who was given in marriage to Adriel, the man mentioned in 2 Sam. 21:8. Thus, it seems clear that this passage does not speak of Michal, the wife of David. Some Bible editions propose this explanation in the margin, that by Michal, Michal's sister is meant."

There is that word "assume" again. Credible biblical analysis is not in the assumption business. It is in the facts, data, proof, evidence, statistics, and direct quote business. And these are considerations with which Arndt and his compatriots all too often have little or no patience. They not only play havoc with a lot of meticulously manufactured methodologies and thousands of tangled theorems but demolish those soothing feelings accompanying the delusional assurance heaven awaits the true believer. Arndt says, "Thus, it seems clear that this passage does not speak of Michal, the wife of David" when there is nothing clear about it. Second Samuel 21:8 uses the word "Michal" not "Merob." That is what is clear. Arndt arbitrarily assumes there has been a copyist error and then, just as arbitrarily, assumes the woman intended was Merob.

Arndt closes the issue by saying, "Another view put forward by some writers is that Merob was called Michal at times, having two names....." Again more speculation and guesswork for the pile, because there is nothing of a scriptural nature that would corroborate this unbridled addendum either. I am always inclined to ask writers who insert nearly as much between the lines as is on them: why don't you just throw away every current version of the Bible and write your own? That way you would no longer be forced to ram square theories through round facts. Then, again, you would have to deviate markedly from the manuscripts wouldn't you. But what are mere trifles like honesty, integrity, and credibility when salvaging Scripture in general and Jesus in particular are at stake. (To Be Continued Next Month)

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #759 from BM of Seattle, Washington

Dear Sir. I am an atheist here in Seattle and was very pleased to see your program on channel 29. I was surprised when you didn't identify yourself as an Atheist or use the word atheist during the program. Those of us who are non-believers need a common word to unify us. In spite of its negative connotation I would hope in the interest of unity you would proudly proclaim your atheism.

Editor's Response to Letter #759

Dear BM. BE is not nearly as concerned with the existence or nonexistence of some kind of supreme being as with Scripture and its alleged perfection. The accuracy of the latter is of greater concern to us than the presence of the former.

Secondly, the word atheist has been saddled with so much negative baggage by religious propagandists throughout the years that it would all but close the minds of thousands if it were to be employed in the title or serve as a backdrop to our programs on a regular basis. It would be like calling yourself a socialist before speaking to a crowd of Reaganites. The word would burn bridges, build barriers and propagate prejudgments.

Thirdly, you must first dissuade people from their erroneous beliefs before suggesting an alternative. How often can you build a structure before bringing in the bulldozer or wrecking ball to prepare the ground. You are trying to eat an omelet without cracking some eggs.

Letter #760 from BG of Jacksonville, Florida

Dear Dennis McKinsey. I just read a book titled "The Bible Code", by Michael Drosnin. A Mormon friend loaned it to me. (He's trying to convert me). We made a deal. I gave him several back issues of Biblical Errancy to read in return.

I don't know if you have ever read "The Bible Code. It was written in 1997 and it's full of claims about the truth of prophesy. I'll quote 2 paragraphs from the book;

"The final countdown now began. The Bible Code had yet again been proven real, accurately predicting an Israeli election that every poll called wrong, just as it had accurately predicted the year Rabin would be killed. But as September 13, 1996, the day of the predicted holocaust drew near, the new Prime Minister refused to heed the warning.

It was 3 years from the day of the Rabin-Arafat handshake. Rabin was now dead, as the Bible Code predicted. The peace was now dead, as the Bible Code predicted. Peres the architect of the peace, had been replaced by Netanyahu, the opponent of the peace, as the Bible Code predicted."

The book is 232 pages long, with graphs and different models to prove his theory. It's getting a lot of attention from different Christian groups. I really wish you would get a copy and review it.....

Dear BG. I have read too many books of this kind already and every one has been all but worthless as a guide to life. Scam artists are everywhere and in few areas are they more multitudinous than in that of prediction and prognostication. Their scheme is one of remaining fluid at all times by avoiding comments that allow no interpretation or escape hatches as if they had the plague. Back-dating and nebulosity lie at the very core of their stock and trade.

Back-dating consists of reading into prior comments interpretations tailored for today's events. The adherents of Nostradamus, for example, are well known devotees of this approach. Biblicists don't have a lock on this strategy by any means. You simply go back into a writing created years ago and twist comments contained therein in such a manner that they can be applied to current events. Nebulosity, on the other hand, consists in making comments today that are so vague, nebulous, and imprecise that they can be distorted as the need arises to fit future events. Either way it's a con game.

Fortunately, both ways can be tested, something the adherents of each subconsciously detest. Ask those relying upon back-dating to peruse their prized writing and show where the specific events to which they refer are stated after having proven the writing was definitely written prior to the events. In addition, ask them to find another prediction of something that will happen in the near future, something specific, something that is clearly quantifiable, measurable, and observable, something that would not be obvious to any ordinary human being, such as predicting the sun will rise over the horizon on June 1, 1999. Then just watch them worm and squirm as they seek to weasel out of these requests through any one of several subterfuges.

Ask the "nebulosity" crowd to predict specific events that will happen in the near future. If the death of Rabin was predicted, then ask them to state, or better yet, write down the day upon which any one of thousands of other famous public figures and celebrities will die. Ask them where the value of various stocks and bonds will be on certain dates or what the winning lottery numbers will be for different state lotteries. This list could be extended almost to infinity. Common sense would tell you that if these people had any kind of lock on accurate predictions, they would be wealthy beyond belief and they would not have to make money through conning others in the process. It never ceases to amaze me how many people are willing to accept the words of charlatans that such and such a book or such and such a person made this or that accurate prediction without checking the source, performing experiments, insisting on being an eye-witness, or demanding a repetition. It is truly incredible.

Practitioners of perversion not only read into events that which they wish to project, but their listeners are often so starved for signs from the Almighty or so desperate for signs, wonders, and messages that they will actually aid the hoax and contribute to their own illusions, delusions, and hallucinations. It's analogous to the fortune teller or psychic who relates events in someone's life in a general way and then the hearer fills in the details, only to conclude the pretender has great wisdom or predictive capabilities. In truth, these frauds provide no information that does not come from the victim either directly or indirectly via soliciting and inveigling. They would be sickeningly rich, rather than just sickening, if they really had powers of projection and prophecy.

Last month's issue discussed several contradictions addressed by W. Arndt in his book Does the Bible Contradict Itself? that have dogged biblicists since time immemorial. We can now continue that litany.

On page 73 Arndt attempts to reconcile the rather simple and direct conflict created by the differing accounts as to the words written on the cross. Matt. 27:37 says, 'This is Jesus the King of the Jews' Mark 15:26 says, 'The King of the Jews' Luke 23:38 says, 'This is the King of the Jews' And John 19:19 says, 'Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews.' So which is it? Arndt says, "...One glance suffices to show that among the four versions there is no difference in meaning. John's account is simply more complete than those of the others.... The opponents say, however, that verbal inspiration implies absolute accuracy. They say that if the Bible had been given by verbal inspiration, then John could not have written that the superscription on the Cross was 'Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews,' while Mark simply says the superscription was 'The King of the Jews.' ...This criticism arbitrarily lays down the principle that when one quotes a statement, one must, in order to be faithful to the original, give every word of it. To state this principle is to expose its injustice. Nothing is more common in all human languages than to abridge a speech, or a remark which one is quoting...

Arndt's defense closely resembles one often used by biblicists with respect to the four different accounts of what occurred at the time of the Resurrection. We are repeatedly told situations of this nature are like obtaining testimony from different witnesses to an automobile accident. Supposedly we can only get the actual picture by piecing all the perspectives together. At least that's the theory. The fact that this entire approach is fatally flawed in several respects never seems to dawn upon the Bible's defenders.

First, the only accurate account according to this ruse is the one that is the most all-encompassing. We are supposed to believe that the one including all the others is by definition the most correct, when that is by no means true. If there are four witness to a hit and run and four different accounts as to how many people were in the car that sped away--one, two, three, or four--the police don't automatically conclude the correct number of occupants is four. There might have been two with two shadows. There might have been three with a head rest giving the illusion of four.

Second, regardless of how often speech is abridged, there can only be one correct wording. If the wording in John is correct then that in the other 3 is erroneous. Imagine the kind of legal chaos Arndt's approach would generate whenever contracts came into conflict. The one with the most words that included the others would always be deemed more valid, even though abridged contracts are often newer and more correct than the predecessor from which they arose.

Third, Arndt says, "The opponents say, however, that verbal inspiration implies absolute accuracy." That is not what opponents say. They say that verbal inspiration implies accuracy, period. And you can't have accuracy when you have 4 different versions. Each version is either accurate or it isn't. There can be no in between, no gradations of accuracy. You can't have "accuracy" and "absolute accuracy." The word absolute is redundant. Arndt's trying to deceive his readers by giving the impression that 3 of the gospels are accurate while only one is absolutely accurate. No. That's not how it works. If one is accurate, then it is absolutely accurate as well, and the others are inaccurate. In effect, Arndt is attempting to attribute gradations of perfection to parts of Scripture. That is about as sensible as saying one comment is accurate, another is more accurate, a third is highly accurate, and another is extremely accurate. And all of this schlock is being attributed to a book that is supposed to be perfectly accurate to begin with. If you are not careful when dealing with biblicists, your mind could become as convoluted, confused, chaotic, and conning as theirs.

Fourth, Arndt says, "One glance suffices to show that among the four versions there is no difference in meaning" when there most assuredly is. Neither Mark nor Luke identify the person on the cross as Jesus. At least not from the superscription per se. Both merely say "the King of the Jews" which could be applied to others who died on the cross in that day and age while claiming to be the King of the Jews. Neither says it was Jesus, the founder of Christianity, who was dying. That assumption is only made because Matthew and John use the word "Jesus" specifically.

Moreover, many people were named "Jesus" in that era. So, if the word Nazareth had not been used in John and carried over into Matthew, Mark, and Luke, there would be no reason to assume the person referred to is the founder of Christianity. How do biblicists know their one and only Jesus of Nazareth is the one who is dying? Because John, and only John, makes the connection in so far as the inscription is concerned, that's how. So when Arndt says, "among the four versions there is no difference in meaning," I beg to differ. Reconciliation is only possible by blending all four and filling in gaps created by three.

The bottom line is that there can be only one writing on the cross; only one of the Gospel accounts can be accurate and verbatim.

On page 114 Arndt discusses the contradiction between Deut. 8:2 ("And thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord, thy God, led thee these forty years in the wilderness to humble thee and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldst keep His commandments or not") and Acts 1:24 ("And they prayed and said, Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, show which of these two Thou hast chosen"). He states, "When the Bible says that God knows the hearts of all men, and again, that God proves men to know what is in their hearts, does it not contradict itself? The matter has puzzled Bible readers time and again. The answer, however, is not so difficult as might be thought. To begin with, there is no passage in all the Scriptures which says that God does not know all things."

Wrong again! Many verses show God either does not know something or is seeking to obtain information. That is the clear import of Psalm 14:2 ("The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek God"). Why would he look down to see if he already knew? Ezek. 20:3 says, "Thus saith the Lord God; Are ye come to inquire of me? As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be inquired of by you." Again we see God seeking information. In Num. 22:9 ("And God came unto Balaam, and said, What men are these with thee?") we again find God seeking information. In Hosea 8:4 ("They have set up kings, but not by me: they have made princes, and I knew it not...") and Gen. 18:21 ("I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not, I will know") God directly states he lacks some information and, unless he is lying, the conclusion is clear. When he says He does not know something, that should settle the matter and would have done so long ago had anyone else been involved. But because his followers can not conceive of him being deficient in any respect, they don't believe him. I, on the other hand, take him at his word. It's only reasonable that if he said it, he meant it. Biblicists are actually saying to God: You don't really mean that God, now do you Oh, yes he does. Don't they believe Scripture! They sure do when it fits their needs and complies with their predilections. One could also consult Gen. 3:9, Gen. 4:5-6, 4:9, 2 Chron. 32:31, and Amos 9:3 for additional confirmation of God's lack of omniscience. As is so often true, once biblicists have a concept embedded in their psyche, God himself can't change their minds.

Arndt continues, "Those statements which speak of God's proving the hearts of men do not say that He is ignorant with respect to the thoughts of their hearts. We cannot say that here we have a case of direct denial, one passage affirming what the other negatives. Again, when the Bible says that God puts men to the test to know their hearts, the meaning evidently is that God subjects man to certain visitations, which will reveal that what God knew beforehand concerning their hearts is absolutely true. It means that evidence is furnished which corroborates God's judgment."

Arndt is trying to escape by turning black into white. What did God say in Hosea 8:4 which Arndt artfully dodges? He stated, "They have set up kings, but not by me: they have made princes, and I knew it not..." He stated I knew it not; he stated it directly. What more do apologists want? At the end of Gen. 18:21 ("I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not, I will know") he directly states that he will then know, which means he did not know beforehand.

Frankly, I don't know what it would take to convince many biblicists that God can come up short in the knowledge field. They won't even accept his own words, words that did not come from men or atheists, but straight from God's "divine word."

Even in the verse Arndt quoted, Deut. 8:2, God said "he humbled thee to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart." In other words, he sought to obtain information. God is making a test in which he is not sure as to what the outcome will be. How could it be clearer?

Arndt also engages in the kind of guessing for which Morison is so famous by saying "the meaning is evidently that..." when there is nothing evident about it. Why would God perform tests to discover what he already knows?

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #761 from DC of St. Paul, Minn. (Part a)

I just reviewed your Issue #2 of Biblical Errancy. It is obvious you went through a lot of work. However, it was also very quickly obvious that you apparently have not read any scholarly or theological works in regards to these matters.

Editor's Response to Letter #761 (Part a)

I will do you the courtesy of forgetting you ever made a comment that ridiculous. Having been in this business as long as I have and having read hundreds of rationalizations and obfuscations, I sometimes wonder if I would not be better off if your comment were true.

Letter #761 Continues (Part b)

To be blunt, even a simple perusal of a few would have eliminated some of your remarks. The issue had a number of simple errors such as in your reference to 2 Kings 13:21 when you talk about a "grave" when it was a tomb; or, in referring to Ingersoll as "one of the greatest Biblical commentators in American history" (Who bestowed that honor? Certainly not anyone who has ever read, produced, or evaluated commentaries); or, in alleging that Adam was born (Gen 1:27); all these reveal a superficial research and analysis on those points.

Editor's Response to Letter #761 (Part b)

Talk about superficial research and to be even blunter, you don't know what you are talking about and your shallow comments reveal that all too vividly.

First, if you had bothered to read any of the literature, other than that within your narrow purview, you would have noticed that the NEB, the NAB, the NASB, the RSV, and the Modern Language all say "grave." Are you saying your scholars are more knowledgeable than those who composed these versions?

Second, you ask who bestowed the title upon Ingersoll of being "one of the greatest Biblical commentators in American history." I did. Notice I said 'commentator' I did not say 'rationalizer,' 'justifier,' or 'practitioner' in the art of 'explaining away.' Biblicists have legions well versed in the craft of mental legerdemain with regard to Scripture, but that skill did not lie within the realm of Ingersoll's area of expertise.

Third, and most pathetic of all, is your assertion that in Issue #2 I was "alleging that Adam was born (Gen. 1:27)" Incredible! Let me quote verbatim what I said on page 2 of the second issue. "And lastly, others participated in even more momentous events. Adam was never born to begin with (Gen.1:27); he came into the world as a full-grown adult." In other words, I said the exact opposite of what you allege. And you are telling me that my research is superficial!

Letter #761 Continues (Part c)

Others are more complicated; your comments about Mt. 12:40 betray a basic ignorance of how Jews measured time, you ignored the context of John 3:13, your assumption that Lk. 23:43 has been accurately punctuated is misplaced, and finally your note of the Mt. 1:16 vs. Lk. 3:23 ignores known Jewish customs. It would be futile to deal with these when you missed the boat on the previous simple one's.

Editor's Response to Letter #761 (Part c)

The word "futile" only applies to your pathetic attempt to manufacture misunderstandings where none exist and to walk off contentedly into the sunset with nothing more than a perfunctory "you missed it" rejoinder. That time excuse with respect to Matt. 12:40 ("For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly: so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth") has been laid to rest on several occasions and by resurrecting it's corpse you have only exposed your failure to have read much of BE beyond the second issue. As a quick reply, tell me how you are going to cram 3 nights into the time allotted.

As far as John 3:13 ("And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven") is concerned, all you did was make an assertion without so much as even trying to substantiate your charge. Second Kings 2:11 shows Elijah went up to heaven far earlier than Jesus and you provided no proof to the contrary. Apparently your word alone is supposed to suffice. Sorry, but that glue won't stick.

With regard to Luke 23:43 ("Verily I say unto thee, Today shalt thou be with me in paradise") you state "your assumption that Lk. 23:43 has been accurately punctuated is misplaced." Good grief, DC. Do you research anything? What on earth brings you to that conclusion in light of the fact that every version of the Bible I am aware of, except one, has the comma in front of the word "today." Do you have any evidence to prove otherwise, or are we supposed to rely upon your conjectures and those of the Witnesses alone. Only the New World Translation of the Jehovah's Witnesses puts the comma after the word today, rather than before, in a transparent attempt to elude a contradiction.

And finally you criticize me for mentioning the contradiction between Matt. 1:16 which says Joseph's father is Jacob and Luke 3:23 which says his father is Heli by saying, "your note of the Mt. 1:16 vs. Lk. 3:23 ignores known Jewish customs." Really? Such as what? You mean the Jews had a custom in which two men could have the same son? Again you seem to feel that your mere assertion is sufficient proof.

Letter #761 Continues (Part d)

The basis for most of the other criticisms are revealed when you talk about inerrancy. You assume, as do the fundamentalists, that in order for the Bible to be the Word of God to man that it must be inerrant. If that assumption is removed your criticisms fall with it. In short, your criticisms are only valid against fundamentalists, or fundamentalism. They are not valid against Christianity or the Bible per se.

Editor's Response to Letter #761 (Part d)

You state, "You assume, as do the fundamentalists, that in order for the Bible to be the Word of God to man that it must be inerrant." My friend there is no assumption involved, only a fact. If that premise is removed, the Book "falls with it." You can no more have a divine book that is flawed than you can have a perfect God creating imperfection or a perfect God that is occasionally imperfect. Just think about the implications of what you are contending. That would mean the very writing most representative of God, indeed, the only writing representing him, would contain errors, inaccuracies, and falsehoods. That would be impossible since God and all his acts and creations are perfect by definition. You can't have perfection creating imperfection since that would nullify perfection....

Moreover, as I have said so often, how do you know what parts are true once you begin to admit certain parts are false, and who makes that determination? You are jeopardizing the credibility of the entire book.

Letter #761 Concludes (Part e)

Could you also tell me what is your background? Were you a Christian at one time (like Till)? If so, what type of denomination? What was your educational background like?

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #761 (Part e)

You can find a short autobiography of me on the last page of the 158th issue. As I noted then, I was never a churchgoer but I have always been interested in philosophy and religion. Although the autobio contains a synopsis of my educational background, I learned infinitely more about Scripture by reading on my own than I ever obtained via formal instruction. Indeed, if I had gone through some sort of seminary or religious indoctrination program, I have no doubt that my ability to objectively critique Scripture would have been dramatically and deleteriously, if not fatally, curtailed.

Letter #762 from EK of Jamaica Estates, New York

Dear Dennis. Regarding Issue #181, Jan. 1998. In his book Does the Bible Contradict Itself? Arndt attempts to reconcile Exodus 20:14 "Thou shall not commit adultery" with Numbers 31:18 "All the women children that have not known a man by lying with him keep alive for yourselves."

You say that if only one person is married, then God is ordering adultery. This is not the Biblical law of adultery as only if the woman is married to another man does adultery occur. (Biblical law is hardly egalitarian). David and Solomon had concubines while married but only when David had relations with Bathsheba, a woman married to Uriah, does adultery occur.

The women children who had not known a man by lying with him were undoubtedly unmarried, hence no adultery could occur under Biblical law.

Editor's Response to Letter #762

Dear EK. I certainly agree with you that biblical law is not egalitarian, but I am in a bit of a quandary as to where biblical law says that "only if the woman is married to another man does adultery occur." Could you cite chapter and verse for that contention? Essentially what we are discussing is the biblical concept of adultery. Scripture says, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," but we are in disagreement as to what it means by adultery. Just what is adultery from the biblical perspective? You say a man can only commit adultery according to biblical law if the woman involved is married, but I don't agree. A couple of verses either state or imply that a married man can have relations with an unmarried woman and be guilty of adultery. The woman involved does not have to be married. Prov. 6:32 says, "But who so committeth adultery with a woman lacketh understanding: he that doeth it destroyeth his own soul." Notice it did not say "a married woman" It says a woman, period, which may or may not include someone who is married. A much stronger verse is Matt. 5:28 in which Jesus says, "...whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." Notice it does not say the woman must be married. It just says a woman, period. Admittedly neither verse says a man is committing adultery by having relations with a single woman, but it is not ruled out either. The basic problem is that the Bible does not clearly and emphatically support either of our positions. The Bible says, "Thou shalt not commit adultery" but nowhere does it clearly and unequivocally define exactly what adultery entails. And because it is not clearly defined I think my position is more reliable than yours. Only by producing verses that state a man only commits adultery by having relations with a married woman can you hope to salvage your stance.

As far as David and Solomon having concubines is concerned, do you have any verses contending their relationships with these women did not constitute adultery? You say, "Only when-David has sexual relations with Bathsheba, a woman married to Uriah, does adultery occur." You will have to furnish a verse or verses to that effect, if your assertion is to have any credibility.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #763 from JB Via Email

(JB sent us a series of letters that represent the kind of mental agony many people endure when they decide to make that qualitative leap from religion to reality, from Scripture to sanity. Few aspects of this transition are more traumatic than confronting friends and relatives who are yet to make the escape and who are critical of those who have. Although JB was a dedicated Christian for many years and taught the Bible with exceptional comprehension, his wisdom and his conscience would no longer allow him to maintain an aura of unreality about his life. So he defected to the other side and this is part of his story. Because JB's journey, doubts, and questioning is representative of thousands, we have decided to make his correspondence available to all, many of whom can no doubt identify with his ordeal. When asked for some general personal information JB stated, "I studied the Bible and evangelical apologetic literature for 23 years on my own. I had no formal training except in Sunday School, which is almost entirely useless for really knowing Christianity. Many years ago I was in Campus Crusade for Christ in college, and I was president on my campus (Emory University in Atlanta) for one year. If it matters, I have a Ph.D. in physical chemistry from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and I work as a technologist and a manager at a major instrument company.

My objective is not really to prove anything, although that would be nice. My real objective is to demonstrate to my in-laws that I came to disbelief competently, and not out of ignorance, whim, or in reaction to an emotional or spiritual conflict, or out of evil in-tent, as they are wont to think. If I achieve this, I will consider my effort successful. It will make my relationship with my in-laws bearable again."

He begins his first letter by saying,

"The following was in response to a nasty letter my father-in-law sent me upon first learning of my deconversion. My intent was to set the tone for a cordial relationship, to prevent my father-in-law from cutting off all conversation, which he had threatened to do in his letter, and to undermine the false assumptions he was making about my loss of faith....

In response to my father-in-law's letter I said, "For 23 years I was a Christian. During that time -- but especially after having children -- I was very serious about living the Christian life and I studied the Bible to learn how to live it. As I studied, I began to encounter difficulties. For many years I overlooked these difficulties and accepted Christianity anyway, believing that the difficulties must have resolutions which I simply had not discovered yet. However, the more I studied, the more numerous and prominent the difficulties became, to the extent that I could not overlook them any longer. I redoubled my efforts, studying the Bible and reading the apologists, and giving Christianity every benefit of the doubt. One day last Christmas season I sat down and opened my Bible for personal devotions and suddenly recognized that I did not believe it anymore. The cumulative force of the difficulties thoroughly and completely discredited Christianity, even for a sincere and willing believer, and the church simply cannot answer the difficulties. I was a sincere, dedicated Christian, seriously trying to live the Christian life, and I lost faith as a result of studying the Bible -- quite contrary to my own wish. I know that my very existence, as a Christian who rejects the faith based on knowledge of the faith, is threatening, and I understand why you have reacted so strongly. My wife and I have experienced many of the same emotions about this that you have. Our loss of faith is something that happened to us while we were doing the things that Christians are supposed to do -- not something that we willfully or maliciously decided. (Why would we? It would have been much easier to continue on as believers.) The whole process has been wrenching for us, and, like you, I have lost many hours of sleep because of it. However, knowing what I know, it is impossible for me to believe again. Belief is not something a person decides to do -- belief is something a person experiences as a result of what he or she knows. To affirm something that 's impossible for me to believe would be lying, and I cannot do it with a clear conscience. [My father-in-law had told me I should believe anyway, whether Christianity is true or not!]

To one of my in-laws I said, I am glad your letter said that you want to maintain good relations between the families. We want the same. It is because we wanted to maintain good family relations that we did not reveal our loss of faith when it first occurred. We wanted to slowly move away from the faith to give you all a chance to get used to the idea and spare you the shock. But we were found out by accident, and so now we all must deal with it. You also said you do not want to debate the issue, and we agree, because debate would result in a family feud. However, I believe that there will always be tension between our families if we close off two-way dialog about the issue. I am willing to discuss the issues with you or any other family member.... Can we keep open the possibility of having a fair, two-way dialog?"

(Next month we will read the letter JB sent to his pastor--Ed.)

Letter #764 from WS via Email

Dear Mr. McKinsey. I've enjoyed your internet site that provides some good arguments for biblical errancy. I am also opposed to the inerrantists. I was reading your 1983 article on "Slavery" and thought that another good point to include is in the book of Philemon. Paul is sending the runaway slave, Onesimus, back to his Christian master, Philemon. This is especially good since it's clear that Christians were also slave owners. Another point in Philemon was that found in verse 8, where Paul encourages Philemon to act out of love when his slave returns, but also recognizes Philemon's right to deal harshly (out of duty) with Onesimus. I haven't read all your commentary to know if you touched on this point, but thought I would bring it to your attention.

Editor's Response to Letter #764

That's an account of the biblical attitude toward slavery that we've never discussed. Thanks for mentioning it.

Letter #765 from DH of Duluth, Minnesota

Dennis. In BE #180, response to letter #754, you say that a radio producer said Robert Ingersoll was, "full of prunes." Well, I agree. Prunes are good for you. Perhaps a healthy dose of Ingersoll prunes would help relieve the mental constipation that seems to inflict so many of these inerrantists. I take a bit of Ingersoll every now and then to keep the mental juices flowing. And of course, no Paine - no gain.

Letter #766 from KB of New York, New York

Let me state that I consider your efforts to expose the true nature of the Bible to be invaluable. I have already bought my brother a copy of your book, and he enjoyed it immensely. I am also the proud owner of your book and every issue of "Biblical Errancy." I have credits equivalent to a masters in philosophy, and I am convinced that reading your comprehensive and exacting scholarship has made me a more careful reader. Dennis, you are indeed a national treasure. Keep up the good work. The road is long, the battles are many, and the enemies are well entrenched and determined, but the war must be fought. Before I started reading your work, I thought this war was a lost cause. Thanks to you I know that it is not. I will continue to do what I can to help on my end.

Editor's Response to Letter #766

Thanks for the kudos. The greatest assistance you could render us at this time would be to play our TV programs on your local public access channel.

Letter #767 from TB of Little Rock, Arkansas

Dennis McKinsey. Hello, my name is TB. I spoke with you once on the phone earlier this year; perhaps you remember. Anyway, I wanted to let you know that I have attended the public access classes required by our local cable company for use of the public access station, and can use it whenever I like. I would be more than happy to air your shows. Please send me as many tapes as you would like aired.

Editor's Response to Letter #767

Bingo! That's precisely the kind of letter I have been seeking from people for lo these many months, TB. Your assistance is most appreciated and that is stating it mildly.

REVIEW

DOES THE BIBLE CONTRADICT ITSELF? (Part 3)

Last month's issue discussed a couple of contradictions addressed by W. Arndt in his book Does the Bible Contradict Itself? that have bothered biblicists for centuries. We can now continue with additional examples.

On page 126 he confronts the conflict between 1 Sam. 16:1-2 ("And the Lord said unto Samuel, How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, see I have rejected him from reigning over Israel? Fill thine horn with oil and go; I will send thee to Jesse, the Bethlehemite; for I have provided Me a king among his sons. And Samuel said, How can I go? If Saul hear it, he will kill me. And the Lord said, Take an heifer with thee and say, I am come to sacrifice to the Lord") and Prov. 12:22 ("Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord; but they who deal truly are His delight").

Arndt states, "The charge is made that God, who in the text from the Book of Proverbs strictly prohibits lying or deception, in the passage from First Samuel Himself commands His Prophet to engage in an act of duplicity and that hence the same God who forbids deceiving people in one passage in another endorses it. A careful consideration will show that the charge is...unfounded. In 1 Samuel 16:1-2 God orders Samuel to anoint one of the sons of Jesse as king of Israel, and when Samuel points out that this is a very dangerous thing, God orders him to offer up a sacrifice at the house of Jesse and on that occasion to attend to the anointing of the king. There is no reason to charge God with ordering Samuel to do something dishonest in this case." Wrong! Of course, there is. God told Samuel to say he had come to sacrifice to the Lord when that's not the reason at all. It's merely a pretext.

Arndt continues, "It is true, when Samuel was asked why he was going to the house of Jesse, his reply was, to offer up a sacrifice to Jehovah. But was that telling a lie? No, he went with that very purpose, and nothing compelled him to tell inquirers of all his designs in going to the house of Jesse." Another falsehood. That certainly was not the very purpose; that was a subterfuge, a ruse, a concoction. In fact, the 16th chapter does not even directly state there was a sacrifice. The fifth verse focuses on this issue the closest but it does not specifically state that a sacrifice occurred.

Arndt continues, "There is certainly nothing dishonest in our speech if, when on the way to the house of a friend in whose company we wish to inspect some lands which we should like to purchase, we simply make the statement, on being asked as to the object of our trip, that we intend to pay a visit to our friend. In that case we are stating the truth, and no one will charge that we are deceiving the questioner by our reply."

As if we did not get enough of this kind of deception and double talk from our political leaders, now we have to endure it from religious spokespersons who are supposedly operating on a higher plain. To say that no one will charge that we are deceiving the questioner by our reply is patently false. I will. That is by no means the real reason and to say that we are doing so in order to pay a visit to our friend is trickery. That is neither the reason nor the motivation, merely a by-product.

Secondly, the parallel Arndt draws between the two accounts is invalid. In 1 Sam. 16:1-2 God not only created a deception but a lying pretext as well, while in the second account the speaker is relating one correct aspect of the whole event but omitting some key information. Although both accounts are deceptions, the main difference is that in the former a direct lie is concocted, submitted, and propounded.

Arndt continues by stating, "Haley (author of the famous apologetic work Alleged Discrepancies in the Bible--Ed.) has this paragraph, which states the situation quite exactly: It is our privilege to withhold the truth from persons who have no right to know it and who, as we have reason to believe, would make a bad use of it. Lord Harvey well observes: 'Secrecy and concealment are not the same as duplicity and falsehood. Concealment of a good purpose, for a good purpose, is clearly justifiable.... in God's dealings with individuals, concealment of His purpose till the proper time for its development is the rule....'" But God is not merely concealing information, as is occurring in the land deal, he is directly telling a man to lie, pure and simple. To perform a sacrifice was not the reason for Samuel going to Jesse. Although Lord Harvey's quote has merit, duplicity and falsehood rather than secrecy and concealment apply to God's behavior in the original contradiction.

On page 132 Arndt faces the contradiction between Job 2:3, 7 ("And the Lord said to Satan, Hast thou considered My servant Job that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and upright man, one that feareth God and escheweth evil?.... So went Satan forth from the presence of the Lord and smote Job with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown?") and Prov. 12:21 ("There shall no evil happen to the just; but the wicked shall be filled with mischief"). Arndt states, "No evil shall happen to the just man, says the Bible. And yet, according to the same Bible, Job, who was a just man, had to suffer evil if ever a man did. How shall we harmonize the declaration in Proverbs with the history of Job? The solution lies in the meaning of the term evil, which in the sense employed Prov. 12:21 describes real hurt or damage to us. Did Job experience evil of this sort? He did not. We must remember that his sufferings were merely temporary, that they led him into a deeper knowledge of God and His ways, that they served as a fire of purification, which made him a better man, that they were the precursor of greater wealth and bliss than he had enjoyed before.... For a while it seemed, it is true, as though Job's lot was a terrible one. in reality it was most blessed."

At this stage of his book Arndt appears to be merely groping for answers.

First, he contends, "We must remember that his sufferings were merely temporary" which is wholly irrelevant. Who cares how long they lasted. The fact is that Prov. 12:21 says "There shall no evil happen to the just." It says NO evil. It did not say the just man will experience evil for only a short period of time or temporarily.

Second, Arndt alleges, "his sufferings...led him into a deeper knowledge of God and His ways" which is also irrelevant, since Prov. 12:21 says "There shall no evil happen to the just." Arndt is trying to shift our focus by saying, "Yes he suffered, but it made him a better man." To Arndt I would say, "What difference does that make in so far as this contradiction is concerned? He suffered, didn't he!"

Third, Arndt states, "Prov. 12:21 describes real hurt or damage to us. Did Job experience evil of this sort? He did not." Is he serious! I wonder if he has ever had boils or known someone who has.

And finally, Arndt states, "For a while it seemed, it is true, as though Job's lot was a terrible one." Whom is he trying to snow! There's no "seemed" to it. It was terrible and if Arndt doubts this, then perhaps he would be willing to endure "sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown." That should awaken him to the errors of his ways with celerity.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #768 from DA of La Puente, California (Part a)

(DA wrote the following comments regarding our 179th issue in which we wrote a critique of DeHaan's 1962 apologetic work entitled Genesis and Evolution--Ed.).

You're dealing with an ancient book written in 1962. OK it went into a 16th printing in 1978, but that is still a long time ago and we may never encounter someone who even remembers the text.... You should avoid reviewing such forgotten works. A quick visit to a book store's religious department might show you what people are actually reading and what they need analysis of.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part a)

I can't help but feel you are trying to plow me under with laughter sometimes, DA, because virtually every one of your letters has at least one belly-shaker, and this appears to be it. So a book written in 1962 is too ancient to be reliable and I should consult more current writings. If you think 1962 is too ancient to be potent, imagine what that does to the Bible. If reliability is dependent upon age, and the older a work is the less credible or powerful it becomes, then the Bible must be among the most dubious and anemic writings in all of history. With supporters like you the Bible does not need critics like me.

Second, you mean biblical defenses were less powerful 35 years ago than they are today. Really! Well what tomes of today do you feel are more potent than those of Haley (1876), Collett (Before World War I), Torrey (1909), Arndt (1955), DeHoff (1962), and DeHaan (1962) to cite only a few examples?

Letter #768 Continues (Part b)

(On page 1 I quote DeHaan as having said, "The first verse of the Bible determines whether you are a believer or an infidel. What you think of this verse determines your whole attitude toward the rest of Scripture." Later, on the same page DeHaan states, "You either believe it or reject it." To all of this I said, "This is the kind of subtle indoctrination that is indicative of the more crafty apologetic writers...."--Ed.).

To this DA asks, "Your in your face flat statement is subtle? I don't know if I want to read something blunt."

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part b)

You have great difficulty interpreting what lies on the page before you, DA, especially when it does not conform to what you want to read or interferes with your predisposition to transform texts into something desirable. I said DeHaan's statement was a "kind of subtle indoctrination." I did not say my comment was intended to be subtle.

Letter #768 Continues (Part c)

(In the 179th issue I said, "one can only shudder at the prospect of using the Bible as the final authority in a subject like chemistry, when none of the chemical elements is mentioned--"Ed.).

DA now says,

I would prefer a more specialized text myself, but my computer program finds 81 mentions of iron, 156 mentions of gold, 123 mentions of silver, 5 mentions of tin, and several mentions of lead...in just the OT. That is several hundred above none.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part c)

Now who are you trying to deceive, DA? None of these "mentions" has anything to do with the science of chemistry but, instead, are directly related to mining, the extraction of valuable minerals, measuring someone's wealth, or constructing with minerals. Do you see any reference to symbols, atomic weights, atomic volumes, or other chemical properties of elements? In fact, do you see any reference to the science of chemistry, period? Of course not. Biblical writers would not know a periodic table from a four-legged kitchen contraption upon which you eat. It is precisely this kind of sleight of hand that causes biblical apologetics to be held in such low esteem by knowledgeable and unbiased observers.

Letter #768 Continues (Part d)

You state, "Matter is all that exists and it has always been here; it has always existed." You might want to recheck your physics. Big Bang theory says there was no matter prior to that event, circa 10-20 billion BC. (A bit before 4000 BC perhaps, but a creation of matter in both cases.)....

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part d)

You need to recheck not only your physics but your logic as well, DA; there is no "might" to it.

First, you assume that the Big Bang theory is the last word in astrophysics. Steady State theoreticians would hardly agree with that and they are considerably more knowledgeable in this whole field than you will ever be. To them matter has always existed.

Second, if matter came into existence by an explosion, a big bang, then the obvious question to be asked would be: What banged? If something exploded, then it had to exist prior to the existence of the explosion.

Third, you talk as if the Big Bang theory is a proven fact and you were an eyewitness. Your ideas may be ancient, but you aren't. It is a theory, not a demonstrable, conclusive fact. Why do you think it is called the Big Bang Theory?

Fourth, you say ten to 20 billion years BC is "A bit before 4000 BC perhaps." With figures that divergent, tongue-in-cheek won't even provide you an escape.

And fifth, you say "creation of matter" in both cases. So, in so far as the development of the universe is concerned, you are equating the Big Bang theory with the mythology of biblical creation. I am sure Big Bang proponents are glad to hear that. Why don't you just call them pseudo-scientists and be done with it.

Letter #768 Continues (Part e)

You state, "Evolution does indeed teach there is upward development...." Not really. Evolution tells us one species comes from another, but only our own bias classifies this as upward development. There is change, but it can either be "upward," "downward," or "sideways." Like beauty, the direction is largely in the eye of the beholder.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part e)

First, considering the fact that life evolved from life forms not appreciably different from simple one-celled organisms to beings with an extremely complex physiological makeup, including a very complicated brain, I would say that evolutionists have proven their case beyond any reasonable doubt. Bias has nothing to do with scientific fact. Are you saying organisms have not in fact become more complex and intricate as time has passed? Are you saying life began with mankind and evolved downward eventually giving rise to viruses, one-celled organisms, etc.? I assume you have something to substantiate a theory as bizarre as this. Would you care to provide some examples of evolution going downward? Some of our readers would probably be more interested than I.

Second, how can a scientific fact as to whether or not an organism is becoming more or less complex or more or less adapted to its environment be comparable to making a subjective judgment regarding beauty? We are dealing with science, not artwork.

Letter #768 Continues (Part f)

You say, "Prisons are heavily populated with people who have low self-esteem....," Better recheck your sources.... Low self-esteem has been a liberal buzz phrase these last few years, and it is both badly defined, and blamed for most everything, without much attempt to produce any actual evidence. When actual research has been done, the results have been rather painful to the theory. People in prison in fact have rather high self-esteem, certainly higher than the facts justified. Those with high self-esteem think they deserve the other guy's money and that they can get away with the crime.... Increasing self-esteem of criminals would increase crime.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part f)

First, you could do with some checking yourself my friend. Only in your case you need to check sources other than those upon which you are relying. Prisons are heavily populated with school dropouts, low achievers in employment and other enterprises, and people whose environmental upbringing has been anything but conducive to the enhancement of self-pride and contentment with one's character. And you are subtly trying to tell me that these are factors favorable to having a high opinion of one's capabilities and worth. Who are you trying to beguile?

Second, would you be so kind as not to characterize me as a liberal or insidiously allege that I am blaming low self-esteem for most everything. When and where did I say that? Would you either cite chapter and verse or confess your blunder.

Third, research by whom? The right wing or fundamentalist sources with whom I suspect you are allied judging from some of your extraneous comments! Now those are reliable sources, indeed!

Fourth, you really exposed your rightist or fundamentalist philosophy in regard to this issue when you said, those with high self-esteem think they deserve the other guy's money and that they can get away with the crime. Since time immemorial you and your colleagues have been preaching that the conditions in which one is raised, heredity, and other material factors are of far less importance to a person's status than individual decisions and responsibility, when that philosophy is no truer now than the first day it was uttered eons ago. You and your cohorts have always tried to blame the victim rather than the conditions or system in which the victim was raised or to which he was subjected. If that is true, then carefully explain to me why blacks comprise between 50% and 60% of the prison population in the United States while they are only 11% of the general population? You would do well to watch our 59th TV program in which this issue is covered more extensively.

Fifth, your Christian indoctrination really came to the fore when you said, "Increasing self-esteem of criminals would increase crime." So low self-esteem and a poor opinion of one's self worth is beneficial to society as whole. You would have us believe that the more people look upon themselves as pieces of dung, to quote Martin Luther, the better off we all are. It is just that kind of comment that really blows the man-hole cover and exposes your philosophy for the sewer that it is.

And lastly, I said "Prisons are heavily populated with people who have low self-esteem..." which is not only accurate but qualified, while you said, "People in prison in fact have rather high self-esteem..." which is not only inaccurate but absolutist in nature. You're following in the footsteps of your favorite book, I see. If you had bothered to take a simple course in logic you would know that your comment is phrased in such a manner as to refer to all people in prison, which is preposterous. Every person in prison has high self-esteem? Are you serious? On second thought, maybe you have more than one belly-shaker this month.

But we are getting too far afield from biblical errancy. BE is not a politico/sociological journal.

Letter #768 Continues (Part g)

With regard to my Letter #750...I never said you should not have the last word in BE. Rather I said you should not cry so hard when the editors of other publications deny you the last word. They are simply doing what you do.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part g)

Don't you have any intellectual integrity? Let's revisit the dialogue verbatim. On page three of the November 1997 issue I said, "DA begins his letter by quoting me as having said to him in Issue 168, 'I get the last word in an individual issue, since I don't know of any other practical way it can be done, do you?'" He replies, "Sure. Do it the same way loads of editors have done with my frequently hostile letters to them. Print it and make no response. Highly practical...."

Clearly you are saying I should not have the last word but I should merely print the words of others without commenting upon them. For you to assert that you never alleged I should not have the last word is patently false.

After laying down this false premise, which is nothing more than an attempt to lead people astray, you falsely allege, "You should not cry so hard when the editors of other publications deny you the last word". When did I "cry so hard" because "the editors of other publications denied me the last word?" You made this charge previously and it was answered in the 168th issue, showing that your memory appears to be no better than your logic.

In regard to this issue, I also stated on page 2 in the 168th issue, "Fourth, the word 'steamed' is not only inaccurate but hyperbolic, unless, of course, you choose to characterize every objection as being 'steamed.'

You love to close with some kind of smart aleck remark, so I will invoke one of your favorites by saying see you next month.

(To Be Continued in the Next Issue)

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #769 from DC Via Email

(DC has some problems with the idea of God which generates several tests in his mind--Ed.)

Dear Mr. McKinsey,

Test #1: If God can do anything, can He find something that HE can't do? If He can find something that he can't do, then is he still omnipotent? If not, do you credit God with only limited omnipotence?

Test #2: If God can do anything, and if He knows everything, does He know a way to kill himself? If so, and God can be killed, is He really Eternal or Omnipotent? If not, then is He really Omniscient?

Test #3: The Bible teaches that Jesus died for your sins in the ultimate sacrifice. Is this true? Some men have sacrificed their lives for other men. They have died and not come back to life. Some ordinary men have died for their friends with no expectation of coming back to life. Jesus reportedly expected to come back to life and reportedly did come back to life, ie., his death was temporary. If you accept that a man's death is a meaningful sacrifice, then how can a temporary death be superior to the permanent death of some ordinary men? If the death of Jesus is a true story, then how was it an ultimate sacrifice, when men have already done the same or more than God?

Test #4: The Bible teaches that modesty is a virtue. Yet, the Bible also teaches that God is Holy, perfect, and to be praised forever.

Editor's Response to Letter #769

Dear DC. Your questions are well taken but why are you directing them to me? Wouldn't it be more appropriate to address to them to the religionists?

Letter #770 from JB Via Email

(Last month's issue contained a letter in which JB explained why he left Christianity. In this second letter JB continues the kind of inter-relational conversation one can expect during an open rejection of religion in general and the Bible in particular by relating the following statement to his pastor.)

To my former pastor:

Last night I learned that my father-in-law called you and told you that my wife and I have lost faith. Let me confirm that it's true that we have indeed lost faith. I had intended to inform you myself at a time of my own choosing, because I did not want you to be in the dark indefinitely about whatever must have happened to us. Anyway, I might as well take this opportunity to anticipate some questions you may have, so I will do so now.

First, the reason we lost faith is simply that we came to the conclusion that the Christian religion is false. I came to this conclusion, quite contrary to my own wish, after years of sincere and thorough study of the Bible and evangelical apologists. My wife followed me into unbelief soon after I lost faith, because of her long and intimate familiarity with my comprehensive knowledge of the Bible and my ability to make sense of it and defend it, which I had demonstrated over the years while leading my small group Bible study. When I told her that I had lost faith because of the serious and foundational fallacies of the Bible, she knew that my new position had to be well grounded in fact, because nothing else would have caused me to change. She knows that there is no secret persistent sin, or angry defiance against God, or unpleasant experience with the church behind my loss of faith. She had seen me struggle to resist coming to this conclusion, but the contrary evidence overwhelmed my intellect, and, if I may paraphrase Josh McDowell, "my heart cannot worship what my mind cannot accept." There is much more that could be said here, but I want to be brief. If you inquire, I will be glad to fill in the story with more detail.

Second, neither the members of my small group nor anyone else at MC [church] know that we have lost faith. When I lost faith, I simply told my small group that leading the Bible study had become too stressful, and that I would not be leading it anymore -- the truth, but not the whole truth. We did not reveal our loss of faith for two reasons. ...

We decided that it would be too traumatic to tell the children.... Instead we are teaching them to think critically and helping them come to their own conclusions as they are ready.

And I did not want to shake the faith of my small group members, especially while we ourselves were in the throes of coping with the collapse of our entire world view. So, since no one knows, you will not need to do any damage control with my former small group members.

Third, I release you from any bond of confidentiality that my father-in-law may have placed on you when he spoke with you. Although we don't make a point of telling people, my wife and I do not mind any longer if other people know that we have lost faith.... You may mention or discuss the matter with others at your own discretion....

Fourth, you may take our names off the church roll at your leisure. We received a call from a deacon of the church shortly after we stopped coming to church, and I believe we told him we were taking a break from church to reevaluate our beliefs and to spend more time together as a family. Of course, we no longer expect to come back, and so our names can come off the roll. We are not in a hurry for you to do this, however, as it makes little difference to us whether we are on the roll, although it is probably abhorrent to you to keep atheists on the church roll any longer than absolutely necessary.

Fifth, we harbor no animosity toward you or the church in general. Some church leaders, whose power of reason is strong enough that they should know better, are culpable for misleading or deceiving people, because they immorally teach dogmas whose truth they recognize to be uncertain. I regard most church leaders, however, simply as victims of the Christian Delusion. I believe the Delusion commandeers the leader's rational faculties and shields itself from the light of reason. I regard myself as formerly a victim of the Delusion, and I regard you as still a victim of the Delusion. If I regarded you as undeluded, then I would have animosity toward you for knowingly manipulating people with falsehoods. I hope that the impact of my loss of faith will put a chink in the armor of your Delusion, and ultimately liberate you from its repressive control. After the difficult transition period, life really is better this side of Christianity.

Finally, I regret that we left the church without a word, especially after having worked with you in various ways to make MC [church] successful. But from our point of view, we had no other choice. How could we possibly have asked you for pastoral support to figure out how to live without faith?! And the relationships we had cultivated in our small group were exactly antithetical to the kind of relationships we would have needed to support us through this loss. Your duty and theirs would have been to shepherd us back into the fold, and so we had to struggle through the loss of faith on our own. In this limited sense, loss of faith is harder than the loss of a loved one, since there is no support of (believing) friends or family to carry one through a loss of faith. Although the news has reached you earlier than I would have chosen, I am glad that you now know why we left. It has bothered me that we left you uninformed about the nature of our departure. In any case, I hope that our relationship can remain cordial, although obviously it must be on different terms than before.

(Next month JB will describe the philosophical problems he had with the Bible--Ed.)

Letter #771 from RR of Palestine, Texas

You may find this interesting. Those whom Jesus raised from the dead, cured of leprosy, or blindness, failed to become his followers. Not one of them appeared at his trial. Not one offered to bear witness of his miraculous power. Certainly there never was a greater miracle, and yet Matthew, who was present-- who saw the Lord rise, ascend and disappear--did not think it worth mentioning. Christian scholars admit that they do not know why.

They also admit that, if the four gospels were written by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, they must have been written in Hebrew. And yet a Hebrew manuscript of any one of these gospels has never been found. All have been, and are, in Greek.

Letter #772 from JT Via Email

Dennis. Just got #176, in which FA (Letter #735 under Dialogue and Debate) says Jesus never missed a meal. Yet, Matthew 4:2 says: "And he fasted forty days and forty nights, and afterwards he was hungry." So he missed around 120 meals in a row.

Editor's Response to Letter #772

Good point, JT. I should have mentioned it in my reply. Can't get em all. There are just too many holes in their arguments.

Letter #773 from Jimmy Via Email

Dear Dennis. I am a born-again skeptic. Thank you so much for the availability of your Biblical Errancy newsletters via the web. I am a recent walk-away from Christianity, and your impeccable logic has helped me to see things more clearly. I consider myself a survivor, and I consider you a helper. Soon I will be strong enough to start working to right the wrongs which I have committed as a Christian, a fundamentalist, and a deceiver.

Issue #184 April 1998, Editor: Dennis McKinsey

COMMENTARY

This month's issue will be devoted entirely to letters from our readers and next month we'll resume our Review of Arndt's work entitled Does the Bible Contradict Itself?.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #768 from DA of La Puente, California Continues from Last Month (Part h)

(On the 4th page in the 179th Issue DA said, "When I point out that errors in the KJV have been copied in many successors, you make the extravagant claim that I am saying '...the Greek and Hebraic translators of modern versions agreeing with the KJV are incompetent.' Not at all. I am saying they are producing flawed text, which is what you expect of any mortal in any case." He now wishes to add--Ed.),

No I do not have to say the editors and translators who agree with the KJV are incompetent when I say they are wrong.... I do not have to claim, much less show, that some translators were incompetent when I call them wrong. I need merely show they were wrong.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part h)

Don't try to expand the discussion to broad generalizations, DA. In so far as the specific problem we were discussing is concerned, you are attributing incompetence to the modern translators who agree with the KJ version of the verse under discussion. We were discussing a particular verse; so don't try to widen the topic in order to make it look as if I am accusing you of saying they were incompetent in every area, period.

Letter #768 Continues (Part i)

(In the same issue I said to DA, "Like all those indoctrinated into Christianity, you look for the kind of ulterior motives that are so prominent within those victimized by your own ideology." He now wishes to say--Ed.),

Now, ignoring the errors in your attempt at long distance psychiatry, this is the pot calling the kettle black. Evolution teaches us there are nothing but ulterior motives, and that the Christian ideas of charity, love, forgiveness, etc. are merely disguised self-interest, or pathological....

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part i)

You are accusing me of practicing long-distance psychiatry with respect to one individual, namely you, when you have the chutzpah to accuse all evolutionists of teaching that self-interest or pathological factors lie behind all Christian ideas of charity, love, and forgiveness. Talk about broad generalizations with respect to motivations in nearly all locations, not to mention a noticeable absence of proof! Do you have any evidence that evolution teaches what you allege? Some evolutionists do and some don't, but to make an all-encompassing indictment of everyone is ridiculous. Apparently you learned about evolution in a fundamentalist Sunday school or its equivalent.

Letter #768 Continues (Part j)

[After citing Ezek. 30:12 ("And I will make the rivers of Egypt dry") in the 168th issue, I asked, "What rivers are in Egypt other than the Nile?" DA wants to return to this issue for a third time. He appears to be obsessed with the number of rivers in Egypt and has decided to anoint this as the issue upon which to make his verbal stand at the Little Big Horn--Ed.],

You wish to assert Biblical error on the grounds that there is only one river in Egypt, the Nile. But there are a number of problems for you to overcome first.

One that I have not brought up before is that the Nile is not the only river in Egypt. The others are poor things compared to the Nile. Indeed, they may not classify as more than wadi (rivers that exist only during the rainy season), but the climate was considerably wetter in 500 B.C. So some may have been full rivers at that time. In any case, the dictionary definition of wadi is a seasonal river, which makes it a river, and Egypt has a lot of wadi.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part j)

First, where did you get the idea that a wadi has to be a river. Egypt could have hundreds of wadi and not one is a river. Webster's New World Dictionary defines a wadi as "a valley, ravine, or watercourse that is dry except during the rainy season. And 2, the stream or rush of water that flows through it." Notice it says "stream," meaning they could all be merely streams, unless, of course, you wish to claim every stream is a river, which could make the ditch that sometimes flows behind my neighbor's house equivalent to a river. Next you'll be telling me the water flowing from an Egyptian's sluice toward a ditch is a river.

Second, you say, "the climate was considerably wetter in 500 B.C." Where on earth did you get that data? What climatological or meteorological agency did you consult for that piece of enlightenment?

Third, you say, "So some may have been full rivers at that time." Now you are engaged in rank speculation of the most unscholarly kind. You say "may have been." Remember what I said in regard to Morison's book Who Moved the Stone? If you don't, I strongly suggest you reread that commentary. You are not only guessing, or should I say hoping, but acting as if that is the equivalent of proof.

Fourth, you say, "the dictionary definition of wadi is a seasonal river, which makes it a river, and Egypt has a lot of wadi." Well, here we have a direct clash between sources. My dictionary does not say by any means that a wadi must be a river. That is by no means a requirement. My Hammond's Atlas shows some wadi in Egypt and defines a wadi as "an intermittent stream." Nothing is said about a wadi having to be a river.

Letter #768 Continues (Part k)

As noted before, you are the one asserting some-thing, and thus the burden of proof falls on you. You like to dodge this by asserting the irrelevant "an extraordinary claim requires extraordinary proof," but that clearly does not apply to the very mundane statement under discussion. You assert this is a contradiction. Thus you must prove it.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part k)

I am beginning to worry about you, DA.

First, what was the original problem? In case you have forgotten or prefer not to remember, it arose from the following. [After citing Ezek. 30:12 ("And I will make the rivers of Egypt dry") in the 168th issue, I asked, "What rivers are in Egypt other than the Nile?"] If you will note, there is a question mark following my comment. So, you have clearly departed reality when you claim I am the one asserting something. I asked a question; I did not assert anything.

Second, the Bible refers to the "rivers of Egypt," so it is incumbent upon either the Bible or its supporters to provide proof of same. To turn the tables, the burden of proof is on you, your book, and its proponents, not me. You say, "You assert this is a contradiction. Thus you must prove it," which is quite wrong. I did not assert anything; I asked a question. And I don't have to reconcile the problem that exists; you do. You must prove there are other rivers.

Third, you allege I "like to dodge this by asserting the irrelevant 'an extraordinary claim requires extraordinary proof.'" Where on earth did you get that pearl? Can't you get anything right? Would you be so kind as to cite one instance in the entire history of this publication where I ever made that comment. Once you realize your search is fruitless, would you be so gracious as to write a retraction with an appropriate apology. As far as I am concerned an extraordinary claim requires any kind of solid proof, extraordinary, ordinary, or otherwise. Apparently you have confused me with someone else. When it comes to miracles and the supernatural I am desperate for any proof worthy of the name. As I have said before, it would be difficult to find topics that get more gab with so little dab.

Letter #768 Continues (Part l)

That in turn means you must prove what the text actually says. Quoting the KJV, known to be frequently wrong, will not do here. When other versions say "river," "streams," or other alternatives, you must demonstrate why "rivers" is the correct text.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part l)

As I said before, DA, you don't listen very well to prior replies and frankly it's becoming something of an annoyance. Several of your letters have shown that you place tremendous importance upon this defense, even though I have exposed its inadequacies on several occasions. So, I am going to put this vapid ruse into its crypt one more time and I trust you will do all of us the favor of letting it remain entombed permanently. I am under no obligation to nail down the wording of your book. Let me repeat that. I am under no obligation to provide the correct wording of your book. You, on the other hand, are saddled with that horrible burden. For you to say that there is a conflict between versions with respect to what the correct wording should be--streams, rivers, and other alternatives in our example--and to conclude from that that I can't prove a contradiction because I don't know the correct wording is utterly futile. Why do I have to keep repeating the same point. You are admitting not only that biblicists don't know what the text says but that you don't either. Therefore that part of Scripture is, for all practical purposes, worthless and should be expunged from the Bible. If you don't know what it says, then why allow it to remain? As I have said before, biblicists have resolved the contradiction by eradicating a part of Scripture in the process. True, you can't prove a contradiction if you can't be sure of the wording. But if you can't be sure of the wording, then that part of Scripture becomes useless and should be deleted. It's only cluttering up the book by adding vacuous verbiage.

The bottom line in all of this is that if biblicists insist on using this defense with respect to innumerable biblical contradictions, then they will, indeed, have resolved innumerable biblical contradictions. But they will have done so only by abolishing most of Scripture in the process, a solution with which I am in wholehearted agreement. If biblicists want to eliminate contradictions by eradicating parts of the Bible, then I certainly can live with that. I would not think of standing in their way. True, you can't prove a contradiction if you can't definitely pin down the wording; but if you can't definitely pin down the wording, then you no longer have Scripture that is definite. In effect, part of the Bible has vanished, and if that system were followed throughout, there would be no need for this publication and I could relax with the feeling of a job well done. For some reason or other a modified version of the old Baby-with-the-bathwater adage comes to mind. You threw out the dirty water of contradictions, but the bathtub in which they reside went along for the ride.

Letter #768 Continues (Part m)

And of course, you must prove that "rivers" is in fact in conflict with the facts.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part m)

As I have already shown, I don't have to prove anything of the sort. There is no "of course" to it. I originally asked a question and it is up to you to provide an answer accompanied with some proof. And until you do, the statement is not to be accepted simply because the Bible says so.

Letter #768 Continues (Part n)

Which brings up the dictionary. (At this point DA quotes me as having said to him, "you can't even find an accurate Webster's Dictionary, since it would be ridiculous to define a river as 'a natural stream of water bigger than a creek and emptying into an ocean.' Where on earth did you get that book?")

Webster's New World Dictionary of the American Language, College Edition, 1962. p. 1258. Also Webster's Revised-Updated Popular Library Pocket-sized Edition, 1968, p. 468. Also a baker's dozen of other dictionaries, mostly of the 2000+ page size, all of which give definitions that allowed delta branches to be called rivers, and offered no definition that rejected such a use. It would appear you did not even consult a dictionary in making a response. Having just told us to do the research, you might want to take your own advice.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part n)

You are one of the most deceptive and unprincipled apologists I have ever encountered, DA, and believe me, I have crossed views with some real flimflam artists. I asked you where on earth you got a dictionary defining a river as 'a natural stream of water bigger than a creek and emptying into an ocean.' Instead, you completely evaded my question by focusing on whether or not deltas are rivers and said, "a baker's dozen of other dictionaries...all of which give definitions that allowed delta branches to be called rivers." What does that have to do with my question? Nothing! You know it and I know it. And why did you try to slip out through a sewer pipe? Because you probably did some actual research and discovered, much to your chagrin and embarrassment, that none of the dictionaries supported your ridiculous comment. My 1700 page Webster's New World Dictionary (Second College Edition, 1982) defines a river as: "a natural stream of water larger than a creek emptying into an ocean, a lake, or another river" which is not only accurate but one with which I would fully agree. I checked several other dictionaries and they all gave essentially the same definition. I did not have to do any research to know your definition was absurd. Common sense was quite sufficient in light of the fact that I could name plenty of rivers that did not empty into oceans. There can be no doubt as to who is deficient in the research department because your commentaries keep submitting your name.

Letter #768 Continues (Part o)

Of course, you might also try (sic) reading what is right in front of you. I said, and you quote "main definition of 'river' is a 'natural stream...'" The main definition is not the only definition, just the prime one. In addition, note the three dots ... that end the quote. This is of course a standard way of saying the quote is incomplete... Irrelevance is the case here. The rest of the quote was "..., a lake, or another river." But that is of no importance to us.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part o)

What utter drivel! All you are doing is drowning in your own river, DA, your river of deceit and disingenuousness. What do you mean the later part of the dictionary definition is irrelevant? It is not only highly relevant but it is what makes the definition true and proves you engaged in prevarication. It's a key part. You don't know what you are talking about and are only hoping you can snow your reader into believing you do. Let's return to your original comment. You stated on page 5 in the November issue and I quote verbatim: "Then there is the definition of "river" to consider. (By the way, my Webster's main definition of "river" is 'a natural stream of water bigger than a creek and emptying into an ocean... '). To that I said: "Moreover, you can't even find an accurate Webster's Dictionary, since it would be ridiculous to define a river as 'a natural stream of water bigger than a creek and emptying into an ocean.' Where on earth did you find that book?" Now you say, "you might also trying (sic) reading what is right in front of you" and that is precisely what I did. I read the very words in front of me that you put in print. Now you are accusing me of not having read the entire definition because I did not take note of what you omitted via three dots (...). You say "In addition, note the ... that ends the quote. This is of course a standard way of saying the quote is incomplete. The definition is not just incomplete. It's inaccurate. You omitted that which matters. The very words you wrote are false and that's that.

Letter #768 Continues (Part p)

We are discussing the branches of the Nile, which empty into the ocean.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part p)

Oh no we are not. We are discussing your absurd definition of a river and your futile attempts to wiggle through the bars of the cage in which you put yourself.

Letter #768 Continues (Part q)

(At this point DA shifted gears and did return to the topic of whether or not the branches of a river's delta constitute separate rivers. On page 5 in the November issue I said to him, "Are you telling me each branch...of that delta is a separate river? If so give me the names of all these rivers." To that he replied, "They already have them. Names like 'West Branch,' 'North Branch,' 'Lower Branch,' 'City Branch,' etc. are common... the branches of a river are routinely named". To that I said, "You exposed your own duplicity by stating, 'the branches of a river.' You just admitted only one river is involved. 'A' river." DA now says--Ed.),

Not at all. "The branches of a river are rivers" is the same style of statement as The sons of a man are men. We would hardly say there was only one man involved. Nor can we say there is only one river involved.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part q)

Your analogy is as bogus as your objectivity. The sons of a man are separate and distinct beings, unconnected to the principal; whereas the branches of a river's delta are inseparable parts of the principal (the river). Indeed the river would cease to exist throughout the length and breadth of the branches were the latter to vanish, while fathers and sons could continue living quite easily were the other to die. This is only another example of why defending the book by whatever rationalizations can be devised, is far more important to you and your cohorts than acknowledging reality and accepting the Bible is innumerable failings and inaccuracies. An absence of scruples is your trademark.

Letter #768 Continues (Part r)

(On page 5 in the Nov. issue I said, "I don't know of any river in the world with branches of its delta classified as separate rivers, and that includes the Mekong, the Amazon, the Ganges, and the Nile." DA now says--Ed.),

Try the Mississippi delta. The river has been trying to switch its course to the Atchafalaya River for some decades.

Editor's Response to Letter #768 (Part r)

First, I did try the Mississippi and it failed the test, too.

Second, you say "The river has been trying to switch its course..." Good grief! Now you are trying to tell me a river has a mind of its own. Do you relate the thoughts of rocks and the intentions of hurricanes as well?

And third, you say, "The river has been trying to switch its course to the Atchafalaya River for some decades." I think you are losing it DA. To begin with, the Atchafalaya River is an entirely separate river running parallel with the Mississippi, so it is not even relevant to the discussion. It is not the Mississippi; it is not a branch of the Mississippi, and it is not connected to the Mississippi. You even admit they are poorly connected by saying, "The river has been trying to switch its course to the Atchafalaya River for some decades." So, other than to escape the stockade in which you imprisoned yourself, why did you even bring it up? You weren't trying to throw me off track by any chance were you? No, of course not. The very idea would never have entered your head.

Letter #768 Concludes (Part s)

Note too that the branches of the Mississippi are called "bayou," a word that comes from an Indian word meaning "river" and one of its definitions is "river...."

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #768 (Part s)

Wrong again. To be specific it comes from a Choctaw word meaning small stream which hardly qualifies as a river.

But even more importantly a modern dictionary such as Webster's New World (1700 pages) defines a bayou as "a sluggish, marshy inlet or outlet of a lake, river, etc." Notice it: (a) does not say it is a river, and (b) says it is part of a lake, river, etc. It is not a lake or river per se.

Incidentally, I know the concepts of the Bible's supporters are antiquated at best, but you would do well to upgrade your socio-politico awareness and terminology. Most of those whose ancestors greeted the white man would prefer to be called Native Americans, not indians with an inaccurate lower case I. If you don't want to be called a Bible Thumper, a Fundie, a bead rattler, a Pope's puppet, (if you are a catholic), or some other disparaging epithet, I would suggest you refer to people in more appropriate and respectful terms by giving consideration to words they prefer.

Incidentally, would you stop putting periods and commas outside of quotation marks. That's a juvenile grammatical faux pas that I find distracting.

Your final two short paragraphs are nothing more than sophomoric summaries offering me advice that could far more appropriately be directed toward your own inadequacies.

On top of everything else, DA, I feel compelled to inform you that although you like to debate, you are nowhere nearly as accomplished as you seem to think you are. And it is quite obvious from your writing style that defending and projecting your own ego is of far greater importance to you than defending the Bible. Win, lose, or draw you not only love to see your name and writings in print but receive a kind of high from the experience. As they used to say in the 60's, You're ego-tripping and, believe me, there can be no doubt you have awfully big ego over which to trip.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #774 from JB Via Email

(Last month's issue contained a letter written by JB in which he explained to his pastor why he left Christianity. In this, his third letter, he attempts to relate the ideological problems he had with the Bible. He states--Ed.),

The following is a short document I wrote to collect my thoughts the day before I told my wife that I had lost faith. I wrote the document for my own use never intending to share it with anyone, and so I do not try to prove anything, but only to summarize what I had learned over the years....

The only hypothesis that fits all the data

- (a) The Bible is not the actual Word of God

- (c) The theology in the Bible is not immutable, but has changed over time.

Therefore

- (a) The Bible does not address every issue for which we need a word from God
- (b) Being inconsistent, the Bible: is unsuitable as a final arbiter in disputes, is a false witness presenting fiction as truth, is untrustworthy in its statements concerning the supernatural, and is neither a sufficient nor reliable guide for living.

WHERE TO FROM HERE FOR ME?

I have spent 23 years seeking answers in the evangelical church without success. Therefore it seems advantageous to withdraw from the church and from teaching the Bible and spend my time more productively. The evangelical church is hypocritical, because it claims to have the truth, but it systematically ignores, denies, and covers up the serious rational challenges to its dogma. I also reject the outright leap of faith required to find a place in liberal churches. In my opinion they are engaging in institutionalized self-delusion.

Letter #775 from MB of Collinsville, Illinois

I was indoctrinated into the Christian religion from an early age, but eventually I began to question some of the illogic that it presented. As a result, I let Christians know my feelings on this controversy. Without surprise, not many Christians showed respect for my view and tried to reveal their "truth" to me. It became irritating to have to defend my disbelief to the arrogant Christians who wanted to save my soul. Thanks to you, I don't defend my disbelief now, but rather I go on the offense and challenge them to defend the Bible's flaws.

I came upon your Internet site. I am very impressed with your exhaustive research and excellent ability to communicate it. I didn't realize that the Bible was that full of errors until I read some of the BE issues at your site. It is refreshing to read such a rational and objective critique of the Bible. Although I am not an atheist, I hold the same feelings as you do with respect to the negative impact that Christianity has on our culture. I also feel it is important to give a balance to such one-sided, false data.

I would appreciate it if you could send me your "Encyclopedia of BE. When I get a little more cash I will send for all the "BE issues". If you have more information on other literature you have, such as tracts on biblical falsehoods, I would love to order some.

REVIEW

DOES THE BIBLE CONTRADICT ITSELF? (Part 4)

Last month's issue temporarily diverged from our ongoing discussion of biblical contradictions faced by W. Arndt in his book Does the Bible Contradict Itself. We can now resume our litany with another example of apologetics in action.

On page 134 Arndt turns to the conflict between Psalm 18:41 ("They cried, but there was none to save them; even unto the Lord, but He answered them not") and Matt. 7:8 ("For everyone that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened"). He states, "When first reading these two statements, one may be led to think that they are in disagreement. Both speak of prayer. The Matthew passage declares that no prayer is in vain; the Psalm passage apparently states that a prayer was offered by certain people and was not heard. The words of Jesus in Matt. 7:8 predicate a universality which the words of David in Psalm 18:41 seemingly deny. The difficulty is easily disposed of. That God hears every real prayer is a blessed truth which is proclaimed in a number of passages in Holy Scriptures. Cf. Prov. 8:7 ('For my mouth shall speak truth; and wickedness is an abomination to my lips'), 1 John 5:14 ('And this is the confidence that we have in him, that, if we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us'), Matt. 21:21 ('Jesus said...If ye have faith, and doubt not, ye shall not only do this which is done to the fig tree, but also if ye shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; it shall be done'), Luke 11:5-13, etc."

Arndt's strategy won't carry the day for several reasons.

First, he has restricted the Matthew passage. It not only declares that no prayer is offered in vain but that anyone praying will attain satisfaction. There are no limitations with regard to the quality of the petitioner.

Second, Matthew says nothing about a "real prayer" as opposed to one that isn't. Arndt is alluding to some kind of fake prayer which is nowhere discussed or defined in Scripture.

Third, the contrary citations are either irrelevant or contradictory. Prov. 8:7 does not say God will or will not answer prayers nor does it outline the conditions under which they will be answered. All it says is that God does not like wickedness. Just because he does not like wickedness does not mean he is refusing to answer prayers.

First John 5:14 is the verse apologists trot out most to escape the all-inclusive comments of Matthew 7. But instead of resolving the problem, it merely exposes a biblical contradiction between 1 John 5 and Matthew 7. Apologists try to use the former to modify and alleviate the latter, when one could just as easily say the latter expands and broadens the scope of the former. It would be textually sustainable to say the original command was that prayer had to be offered in accordance to God's will in order to be fulfilled but later that requirement was dropped and all prayers would henceforth be met. They no longer had to be offered according to his will.

Matt. 21:21 states that your prayer will be answered if you have faith, but it does not say that in order to be answered you must have faith. Faith is not alleged to be a requirement.

Matt. 21:21 says that if you have faith your prayer will be answered, while Matt 7:8 goes further by saying prayer will be answered, with or without faith.

Fourth, Arndt states, "The words of Jesus in Matt. 7:8 predicate a universality which the words of David in Psalm 18:41 seemingly deny." There is no "seemingly" to it. The latter directly states that they cried and the Lord "answered them not." Yet, Matt 8:7 says "everyone who asketh receiveth." The word EVERYONE is all inclusive. The bottom line is that none of these verses will resolve the original contradiction through modification of Matthew 8:7.

Arndt nearly always says something akin to: "The difficulty is easily disposed of" with respect to nearly every contradiction he confronts, and almost never is that proven valid.

Arndt concludes by saying, "At the same time, however, it is true that there is many a cry which the Lord does not answer. These vain, fruitless utterances come from the lips of God's enemies, the very kind of people that Psalm 18:41 speaks of. The Scriptures assure us in solemn words that the prayers of the ungodly are not acceptable. Cp. Psalm 66:18 ("If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me"), 1 Sam. 28:6 ("And when Saul inquired of the Lord, the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams nor by Urim nor by prophets"). The so-called prayers of these people simply are no prayers at all. ...when the Bible says every prayer will be heard, it has reference to real prayers, the petitions sent up to God by His Children."

This explanation is virtually no defense at all.

First, Matt. 7:8 does not restrict its coverage to God's friends or exclude his enemies. Where is that to be found in the text? It is a blanket statement with an absolutist nature that is unmistakable and undeniable. It clearly says EVERYONE.

Second, in so far as Psalm 66:18 is concerned, we are back to a perfection dilemma that has plagued biblicists from the beginning. If one need only have some iniquity in his heart to be excluded by God, then we are all excluded and no one's prayers will be heard, since everyone has some degree of iniquity. After all, doesn't the Bible say that we are all sinners and we have all come short of the glory of God (Rom. 3:23). Who doesn't have some iniquity in his heart, be it ever so small? No one is perfect.

And third, Arndt states, "It has reference to real prayers, the petitions sent up to God by His Children." We are repeatedly told by Christians that we are all God's children. Now Arndt is claiming that real prayers only come to him from His children and those from the "ungodly are not acceptable, the so-called prayers of these people simply are no prayers at all." But they have to be acceptable, if we are all God's children.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #776 from EK of Jamaica Estates, New York

Dear Dennis. Regarding Issue 182, Letter #762 & the Response.

You asked that I cite chapter and verse to support my contention that "only if the woman is married to another man does adultery occur."

In Deuteronomy 22:22-27 there are three examples:

- 1) a man who lies with a woman married to another man.
- 2) a man who, in the city, lies with a betrothed virgin who does not cry out and
- 3) a man who, in the field, takes hold of a betrothed damsel and lies with her but she cries out.

In all three examples the man receives the death penalty in accordance with Leviticus 20:10. The first two women are also put to death in accordance with Lev. 20:10 but the third is not because she cried out in the field and there was no one to save her. All three are examples of adultery, since the women were either married or betrothed to another man.

In Deuteronomy 22:28-29, a man finds a virgin who is not betrothed and lies with her. The man's "punishment" is he shall give the girl's father 50 shekels of silver and she shall be his wife because he humbled her and he may never divorce her. The capital punishment for adultery does not apply because adultery did not occur because the woman was not married or betrothed. The man's marital status is never an issue.

I found additional support for my position in the NT. In Romans 7:3 it says that a woman, who while her husband lives, marries another man she will be called an adulteress, but if her husband dies, she is free from that law, so that she is no adulteress, though she has married another man.

Editor's Response to Letter #776

Dear EK. I think you got lost in the shuffle somewhere, so let's return to the beginning. You said to me in the 182nd issue (Feb.), "You say that if only one person is married, then God is ordering adultery. This is not the Biblical law of adultery as only if the woman is married to another man does adultery occur. (Biblical law is hardly egalitarian). David and Solomon had concubines while married but only when David had relations with Bathsheba, a woman married to Uriah, does adultery occur. The women children who had not known a man by lying with him were undoubtedly unmarried, hence no adultery could occur under Biblical law." In other words, according to you, adultery is ONLY possible under biblical law if the woman involved is married. But as I said to you then, "I am in a bit of a quandary as to where biblical law says that only if the woman is married to another man does adultery occur. Could you cite chapter and verse for that contention?" Your current attempt to justify your original assertion is wholly inadequate. You cite Deut. 22:22-27 which contains verses that nowhere say that the woman must be married in order for adultery to occur. They say that if the woman is married or betrothed, adultery has occurred. They do not say the woman must be married or betrothed in order for adultery to have been committed. To repeat one of my favorite analogies: When I say a dog is an animal, I am not saying that in order to be an animal you must be a dog. In the present instance, the Bible is saying that if the woman involved is married or betrothed, then adultery has occurred; but it is not saying the woman must be married in order for adultery to occur. You say, "In all three examples the man receives the death penalty in accordance with Leviticus 20:10." Correct! That is because the woman was married or betrothed, but that is not saying ONLY if the woman is married or betrothed will the death penalty be imposed.

You say, "In Deuteronomy 22:28-29, a man finds a virgin who is not betrothed and lies with her. The man's "punishment" is he shall give the girl's father 50 shekels of silver and she shall be his wife because he humbled her and he may never divorce her.

The capital punishment for adultery does not apply because adultery did not occur because the woman was not married or betrothed. The man's marital status is never an issue." That is not what the text says. The man's marital status is never mentioned. Maybe capital punishment is not imposed because neither is married. How do you know what the punishment would have been if the man had been married and the woman had not been? You are assuming automatic exoneration while I am saying now, as I said in February, that the Bible does not make its position clear in this regard. We simply don't know what the verdict would have been if only the man had been married and there is no way to be sure. Why? Because the Bible nowhere says, as you claim, that ONLY if the woman is married does adultery occur.

Romans 7:3 ("So then, if while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law....") certainly does not support your position. Nowhere does this verse say that adultery ONLY occurs if the woman is married. It only says adultery is occurring if she marries another man while her husband is alive, but it does not say that adultery is ONLY possible when a married woman is involved with a man other than her husband. Suppose a married man has relations with an unmarried woman? Is that adultery? According to your interpretation of Scripture, it is not, while according to mine it very well could be, although Scripture is too imprecise to make a definitive judgment.

I feel compelled to repeat what I said in February: The basic problem is that the Bible does not clearly and emphatically support either of our positions. The Bible says, Thou shalt not commit adultery but nowhere does it clearly and unequivocally define exactly what adultery entails. And because it is not clearly defined, I think my position is more reliable than yours. Only by producing verses that state a man only commits adultery by having relations with a married woman can you hope to salvage your stance. And that you have again failed to do.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Letter #777 from JB Via Email

(Last month's issue presented a letter written by JB to his pastor in which JB delineated some of the reasons he went from being a 23-year Sunday school teacher to being an atheist. He received a critical reply from his pastor and decided to write a fourth letter in order to provide the following itemized refutation of the pastor's judgments and conclusions--Ed.),

The Pastor says, Dear JB. You have not had a "Loss of faith". You have believed a lie (Romans).

JB replies: In your theology, either I was never a "true believer" in the first place, or I am still a true believer, but I have erred. This is a fine theology until one actually experiences the unmentioned third option: I was a true believer, but I lost faith because the FAITH ITSELF was in error. Those who know me best also know that this option does exist and hence that Paul must have been wrong. By the way, there ought to be room in your theology for people who truly fall away. The writer of Hebrews contradicts Paul and acknowledges that believers really can fall away.

The Pastor says: You are a smart man JB but you are not smarter than Jesus!

JB replies: Your theme throughout your message about my being a "smart man" is irrelevant to the question of whether Christianity is true or false. The problems with Christianity are plain enough that anyone of average intelligence can see them, if they will only look. Even if someone does not see them through the rose-colored glasses of interpretation provided by the church, it does not take above-average intelligence to understand the problems when someone points them out. In fact, intelligence actually hindered me from discovering the problems in Christianity, because I could think of so many more ways to rationalize the problems than most people could. As to the intelligence of Jesus, he himself misquoted Old Testament scripture, attributed the Pentateuch to Moses when it could not possibly have been written by Moses, and got the details wrong in the Old Testament story of David and the shewbread. It is odd how the Son of God could have made such errors, isn't it?

The Pastor says, Even if you reject Jesus as deity, he was by all historical accounts the most profound and wise teacher who has lived. He taught that you should fear God.

JB replies, This is an unsubstantiated statement that you are repeating from the evangelical apologists. The "all historical accounts" that you speak of are essentially nothing more than the four gospels, and these are so problematic that they discredit themselves. As to Jesus being "the most profound and wise teacher who has lived," this has been convincingly discredited. I can give you a reference if you care to read the opposing view.

The Pastor says, You are a smart man, but not likely any smarter than King David, King Solomon, Moses, the Apostle Paul, and other historical figures who were smart enough to believe in God.

JB replies, The modern Age of Reason didn't start until about three hundred years ago. Until then most of the western world, except for some educated Greeks, was mired in superstition. The question of God's existence would hardly have even occurred to them. For a thousand years after Aristotle, people believed that an iron object would fall faster than a wooden object of the same shape and size. It wasn't until Galileo that this easily refuted belief was overturned, because he was willing to test it. This shows that "time-tested" beliefs may not necessarily have been tested at all. The prevailing culture dismissed the truth, preferring to believe what it had always believed, not unlike what is happening with Christianity today. David, Solomon, Moses, and Paul also believed the world was flat and that the sky was a solid dome of transparent material holding an ocean of water off the earth (reference available upon request). Shall I believe that, too? You have committed the fallacy of arguing from authority, and I have shown why it is absurd to do so.

The Pastor says, You are not a novelty JB. Even Nebuchadnezzar had a battle with pride and the false belief that there is no God. He returned to his senses.

JB replies, No, I am not a novelty, but if I looked only at the examples the church gives me, I might be excused for thinking that I am novel. The church conveniently ignores the stories of people who have reasoned their way out of Christianity. If their criticisms are touched on at all, it is in parody. Why doesn't the church study the serious critics of Christianity and refute them in Sunday School? Surely if Christianity can really hold up to the challenge, this would be a way to bring more of the "wise" into the church, of whom Paul says there are so few. Why is not only your church, but the church universal, ignoring this unsaved population? I know why -- the ignorant and the credulous are easier to convert. You believe that I, like Nebuchadnezzar, have a problem with pride, and that is undoubtedly the reason you keep calling me a smart man. On the contrary, I came to disbelief in all humility, against my own wishes. Succumbing to the contradictions, inconsistencies, and incoherencies of the faith has nothing to do with pride.

The Pastor says, You are a smart man, but you are not omnipresent. Therefore, you cannot KNOW there is no God somewhere in the universe can you? Therefore you cannot be an Atheist. No honest, rational, logical person would ever claim omnipresence except God himself. You are not really ready to make such an irrational claim as Atheism are you JB?

JB replies, You believe the Christian apologists too readily. There are many things wrong with what you say here. Let me point out two.

First, you load too much meaning onto the word "atheist." The word literally means "without theism." An atheist, that is, a person who is not possessed of a belief in a god, does not necessarily make the assertion that "I know there is no god," although some do. I myself am an atheist because I am not possessed of a belief in a god. My belief in God evaporated when I lost faith, through study of the Bible. However, I do not assert that "I know there is no god." That goes beyond logic, as you say. If you put a gun to my head and force me to defend some assertion about my atheism, I would assert something like, "It is so unlikely that a god exists, that for all practical purposes I can live my life as if no god does exist. Practically speaking, then, I can actually believe that there is no god, even though I cannot demonstrate beyond all possible doubt that no god exists." I hope from this explanation that you can see that agnosticism (literally "without knowledge") overlaps atheism, and that the two are not two distinct categories, as you have assumed. A person can be both an agnostic and an atheist at the same time. That is, a person can hold the position that we have no knowledge of a god, and the same person, simultaneously, can be unpossessed of a belief in a god.

Second, lack of belief in a god does not require omnipresence. It is simply a state of mind of a person. Now, I would agree with you that to assert truthfully that no god of any kind exists would require omnipresence, and, I might add, omniscience. (JB should have rightfully placed the burden of proof upon the pastor's shoulders and asked him to prove there is a God--Ed.). However, it is possible to assert truthfully that the CHRISTIAN GOD does not exist, with no need of omnipresence or omniscience. This is because the characteristics alleged of the Christian God make it an incoherent concept. Without going into lengthy detail (but I can give you a reference upon request), I will just say that the Christian God is like a square circle. Any reasonable person, without being omnipresent or omniscient, can assert truthfully and confidently that a square circle does not exist anywhere in the universe.

The Pastor says, At best JB, you might qualify as an Agnostic. I'm sure deep in your heart is a wound painful enough to cause you to need to believe the lie that there is no God. Perhaps it eases a struggle over death, your own or someone you love or loved?

JB replies, Why can't Christians simply accept the fact that sincere believers can reject faith based on purely intellectual examination? I was perfectly content and comfortable believing Christianity. It was losing faith that put me in an uncomfortable position. When I first lost faith, I actually believed that I would live the rest of my life in existential despair. But I had to disbelieve, despite the consequences, because the intellectual bankruptcy of Christianity was so profound. I also discovered that the alleged existential despair of unbelievers is a lie created by the apologists to keep believers tame.

The Pastor says, God is merciful JB. You will never be able to explain all his ways.

JB replies, But I never required an explanation of all God's ways. I do require an explanation of all the blatant contradictions, inconsistencies, and incoherencies of the Christian faith. If Christianity were not so thoroughly discredited, I would still be a believer. Your entire message begs the question of the accuracy of the Bible. You'll never convince me of the truth of the Bible by ignoring its problems.

The Pastor says, Innocent people are being led by you. You are a smart man, but you are jumping out of an airplane with no parachute and dragging others with you. How will you compensate your children and your wife in eternity for your error?

JB replies, So, I can snatch my wife and the kids out of God's hand? You credit me with too much power. I'm not indoctrinating any of them. It is the church that indoctrinates. I am doing nothing other than expecting them to examine the evidence for themselves and come to their own conclusions. Of course, you know that the church could never survive this way. That is why it resorts to indoctrination of children, and the younger the better. After all, the church has to get to them before they are capable of critical thinking.

The Pastor replies, This is no scientific game JB. You are culpable before an almighty God.

JB replies, This statement makes an appeal to fear. Although it has become unfashionable to talk about Hell, Christianity is indeed a religion based on fear. Jesus's only unique contribution to religion was the invention of Hell. Before Jesus, the Jewish faith viewed death as a rest and a comfort to look forward to after this weary life. It is as if a sadistic God, in the initial creation, had mistakenly left this loophole, and so he sent Jesus to take away even the hope of a final peace in death by threatening the living with Hell after death.

The Pastor says, You are a smart man. Seek wisdom.

JB replies, I sought wisdom in the Bible, believing that God's Word must be wise. And there IS some wisdom in the Bible, human wisdom, because human nature has not changed over the course of history. But when I found and confirmed contradictions, inconsistencies, and incoherencies in major doctrines, including soteriology, I found it impossible to trust the Book on its own authority alone. You or I could write a better Bible.

The Pastor says, Don't be the fool who has said in his heart that there is no God.

JB says, I've already addressed the assertion that "there is no God." However, the foolishness of it is not saying it in your heart. If there is a foolishness, it is saying it out loud in front of your believers, as I have done. It's almost more trouble than it's worth.

The Pastor says, Unbelief is an earthly sport. Carl Sagan became a believer the second he entered into eternity.

JB replies, Do you care to prove this unsubstantiated assertion? And it's OK with me if you write plainly and say "Hell" instead of "eternity." Softening the "gospel" (literally "good news") of Hell keeps contemporary people in the pews, but I can see right through it.

The Pastor says, Behind every agnostic is a conflict with God. You are a smart man JB, but you are not smarter than God. Humble yourself under his mighty hand!

JB replies, I have as much conflict with Yahweh, the ancient Hebrew tribal war god, as I do with Allah, Thor, Zeus, Brahma, Mithra, Isis, Osiris, Quetzalcoatl, or any of the thousands of other gods created by the mind of man. By the way, you are only one god away from being an atheist yourself. If you'll only give up belief in Yahweh, as you have given up all these other gods, you'll be without a belief in a god. Maybe you would like to tell me why you believe in this one last god, and deny the rest? Maybe you would like to explain to me and my in-laws why your belief in Yahweh has nothing to do with the culture that you grew up in; that if you had been born Arab you nevertheless would have believed in the Jewish god Yahweh, and not Allah, for example. After all, I need to know which god to humble myself to. If I had to lay bets on eternity, I would have to cast my lot with the god of Islam. His hell is worse and his heaven is better than that of the Christian god. According to ALLAH anyone who says that Jesus is the son of God is damned, but according to YAHWEH, anyone who does NOT accept Jesus as the son of God is damned, so I cannot accept both religions, as they are incompatible. Tell me which god is the right one. I really need to know.

And give me some solid reasons, please. After all, it's your word against Allah's; you are a smart man, Pastor R, but not as smart as Allah.

The Pastor says, You have embraced a belief that denies God is. You have become a believer in the religion of unbelief. Your position changes nothing in the universe, heaven, or hell. It is self-defeating. Call out to God for deliverance from Satan's greatest and oldest deception JB!

JB replies, More unsubstantiated assertions. My sarcasm above will answer this as well. Why don't you give me some reasons to believe these things, instead of making bald assertions? Surely the Holy Spirit speaking through you can't be outwitted by a mere human speaking reasonably, can it?

The Pastor says, I will count it a privilege and an act of friendship to help you back when you are ready. I miss you and your family.

JB replies, It is impossible for me to believe again, knowing what I know. If you see me coming back, you will instantly know that I have lost my ability to reason. However, we miss MC [church], too. The loss of a church family was the hardest part for my wife. It's too bad that Christianity is too narrow to extend fellowship to former believers who have rejected the faith based on knowledge of the faith. Is MC [church] really a "church for the unchurched," proud that even an atheist [an atheist, married to a believing member of the church, used to run the church soundboard]) could work the sound board and feel a part of things? Then extend the hand of fellowship to my wife and me, and invite me to disclose my reasons for unbelief to anyone who asks. Give your congregation the chance to reach out to me in Christian love and convert me. The church accepts people "Just As I Am," as the hymn goes, but only so long as they are ignorant and credulous enough not to ask embarrassing questions....

The Pastor says, I appreciate your actions toward MC [church] people. Please continue that behavior. As the Shepherd of this flock I would count it as a personal attack for you to influence even one MC sheep toward your unbelief. I would be assertive and passionate in my contact with you. I trust this is a non-issue.

JB replies, "Sheep" is an apt word. You know as well as I do that there is no way these people can sustain faith in the face of reason, and that is why you feel you must protect them. As long as you can keep them ignorant, they will be your "sheep," but if you allow them to be exposed to reasonable criticisms of Christianity you know that they will begin to think for themselves and become the freethinking "people" they were meant to be. Then you will lose all control. We have our own reasons for not revealing our loss of faith to MC [church] people, and so I don't expect that we will clash on this, although it is possible that our unbelief could come out by accident as it did with our extended family. However, I take your statement as a threat of blackmail. What you are really saying, in plainer terms, is "keep quiet or I will defame you." I've seen you do it before. You're very good at it, and it is ugly. Remember? Early on, I myself stood up in the congregation and backed you up the first time I saw you shun someone out of the church. My comments and initiative turned that meeting in your favor and could very well have prevented a schism. Ironic, isn't it?

P.S. I don't envy you in the position I have left you in. If you DO answer my challenges, you will be inviting me to recite even more challenges to the absurdities of Christianity, with my in-laws looking on, particularly if you keep spouting the sophistries of the Christian apologists. If you DON'T answer my challenges, then you will leave them wondering whether Christianity is defensible. And if you make some excuse to cut off the dialog, you disobey the inspired Word of God, which enjoins you to "Always be prepared to give an answer to everyone who asks you to give the reason for the hope that you have. But do this with gentleness and respect....," (1 Peter 3:15). I have expressly asked you to give a reason, and you are obligated by your own Holy Book to answer. You say you don't have time? The inspired Word of God leaves no room for this excuse since you are to "be prepared IN SEASON AND OUT OF SEASON; correct, rebuke and encourage--with GREAT PATIENCE and CAREFUL INSTRUCTION." (2 Timothy 4:2 NIV). The Bible leaves no middle ground. It forces believers to act one way or another, to be hot or cold, but not lukewarm. The unrelenting Bible forced me away from the faith in the same way. So, what are you going to do? Don't bother trying to switch our conversation from e-mail to the phone. I want our exchanges written out for all to see. E-mail is not at all like preaching from the pulpit, where no one has the opportunity to hold you to account for your statements, is it? I am in the position of strength. My position is relatively straightforward, while yours is impossible to defend reasonably.... And I have nothing to lose, because, unlike believers, I am willing to follow truth wherever it may lead, as I demonstrated when I left the faith I loved. If the truth leads me back to the Christian faith, then so be it. You, on the other hand, have an entire world view (read, "delusion") and a livelihood to lose if you follow the truth. So, what are you going to do?

REVIEW

DOES THE BIBLE CONTRADICT ITSELF? (Part 5)

On page 137 Arndt tackles one of the most potent and implication-laden contradictions in all of Scripture. It pertains to the conflict between Eccle. 3:19-20 ("For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth the beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they all have one breath, so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast; for all is vanity. All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again") and verses like John 5:28-29 ("Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming in which all that are in the graves shall hear His voice and shall come forth: they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation").

Arndt states, "The second text, as so many others, proclaims that there will be a general resurrection of the dead. The first has often been held, in our days again by Dr. Fosdick, to teach that death means annihilation and that hence the hope of the resurrection from the dead is vain. If the Ecclesiastes passage really teaches the utter destruction of the human person when man dies, then we must admit the existence of a discrepancy in the Scriptures. But does it contain such teaching? The text mentioned above merely asserts that as the beasts die, so must man die. The time comes when a beast breathes its last, and so it is with man. All go unto one place, says Solomon. All are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. It is plain that he is speaking of the dissolution of the body which results from death.

Wiggle as he may, Arndt will not escape this cul-de-sac.

First, he states, "The text mentioned above merely asserts that as the beasts die, so must man die." Oh no it doesn't! No doubt he would like to restrict our vision to this consideration, but the text alleges more than that. "Merely" is by no means accurate. The text states, "man hath no preeminence above a beast." If some part of man lingers on, be it a soul or otherwise, and goes to some sort of heaven or limbo, then man clearly has preeminence over the beasts, unless, of course, biblicists wish to allege that all animals not only have some kind of soul but go to heaven as well.

Second, the text says "All go unto one place." If people go to heaven or some sort of eternal reward or punishment and animals do not, then it is by no means true to say "All go unto one place." In fact, they all go to two or more places. And if that is true, then it would be incorrect to claim, as does Ecclesiastes, "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them." Unlike the animal kingdom, more than one thing befalleth mankind.

Third, there is a direct clash between the Eccle 3 and John 5 when the former says "for all is vanity". In the context of Eccle 3:19 "vanity" means futile, idle, and worthless. If that is true, then why would the hope of an afterlife promised in John 5 and other verses have any credibility?

Fourth, Arndt concludes, "But what of the soul? Does the writer of Ecclesiastes know that a man has an immortal soul, or does he deny the existence of an imperishable element in the human being? That he firmly believes in the immortality of the soul is plain from chapter 12:7, where he says: "Then shall the dust return unto God, who gave it." Everyone can see that here the return of the human spirit to God when death sets in is taught, and immortality is implied. This, then, is clearly established. The writer of Ecclesiastes...teaches just as clearly that the human spirit goes to God when a person dies and hence does not cease to exist."

Apologetists often race off to 12:7 to elude the clear comments in Chapter 3 but to no avail.

(A) It says, "Then shall the dust return unto God, who gave it," and yet, Arndt claims "Everyone can see that here the return of the human spirit to God when death sets in is taught, and immortality is implied." But it says dust. Where does the text use the word "spirit" or say anything in regard to the spirit going somewhere? There is no equating of dust and spirit, nor is there any reason to equate the two. Talk about a leap of faith!

(B) If this ruse were valid, then we would only have returned to square one because man would, in fact, have "preeminence above a beast." That, in turn, would directly contradict Eccle 3. Either way, a major contradiction is inescapable.

And finally, what exposes the duplicity and utter disingenuousness of our apologetic friend as much as anything else and provides powerful evidence as to why apologetists are not to be trusted in their on-going attempts to defend the Bible at all costs is the fact that Arndt omitted the 21st and 22nd verses. The former says, "Who knows whether the spirit of man goes upward and the spirit of the beast goes down to the earth." Here the text does talk about "spirit," unlike earlier when Arndt tried to equate dust with "spirit," and it clearly states man does not definitely know where his spirit goes.

The final verse in this chapter, the 22nd, says, "So I saw that there is nothing better than that a man should enjoy his work, for that is his lot; who can bring him to see what will be after him?" Arndt completely ignores this admonition and definitely thinks he can predict the future by relying upon other parts of scripture that supposedly tell people what will be after them. In other words, he thinks he can do what Ecclesiastes says cannot be done.

On page 141 Arndt attempts to cope with another one of those time-honored dilemmas that has troubled millions of Christians for centuries. It concerns the clash between Isaiah 9:6 ("For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon His shoulder. And his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace") and Matt. 10:34 ("Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword"). (We will leave aside all the factors showing the Isaiah verse could not apply to Jesus and proceed on the temporary assumption that it does--Ed.).

Arndt states, "Bible readers have wondered why Jesus, who is called the Prince of Peace in the magnificent prophecy of Isaiah, declares that He did not come to send peace on earth, but a sword. The context of Matt. 10:34 shows in what sense the words of Jesus must be taken. He is not speaking of a war which the Christian will have to wage, but which they will have to endure. His meaning is that acceptance of the Gospel will not bring outward tranquility and peace upon His Apostles, but enmity, hatred, opposition, and persecution.... The one speaks of the character of Jesus and that of His kingdom, the other of the experiences of His followers here on earth."

Arndt says Jesus "is not speaking of a war which Christians will have to wage, but which they will have to endure," when the text projects precisely the opposite meaning. Not only does Matt. 10:34 say nothing about the followers of Jesus being required to endure anything, but "sending a sword" is a clear call to arms. Arndt refers to the context of Matt. 10:34 and acts as if that modifies the message while ignoring his own instruction. The context disproves the very point he is trying to peddle. The next verse, Matt. 10:35 ("For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law") provides clear evidence that Jesus is referring to waging a war, rather than enduring some kind of enmity, hatred, and persecution. "I came not to send peace" doesn't refer to others creating turmoil, but to Jesus being the source. He says, "I" came to send a sword," not others. Sending a sword refers to taking the offensive and has nothing to do with enduring anything.

All too often I can't help but feel that in a weird sort of way I am acting as an attorney for Jesus. He repeatedly makes statements to which his "supporters" implicitly reply: "You don't really mean that." Oh, yes he does, and I fail to see how this comment could have been clearer.

First, he said, "I came not to send peace." It doesn't refer to others creating turmoil. Jesus said he would be creating the tumult.

And secondly, "sending" a sword or taking the offensive has nothing to do with "enduring." The latter was created ex nihilo.

Moving to our third and final conflict this month, on page 150 Arndt faces the clash between the comment by Jesus in Matt. 6:31 ("Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we bring? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed?") and the statement by Paul in 2 Thess. 3:12 ("Now, them that are such we command exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ that with quietness they work and earn their own bread"). Arndt states, "These well-known texts undoubtedly have raised the question in the minds of many a Bible reader whether it is not somewhat difficult to harmonize the words of Jesus and those of Paul in this instance. Jesus apparently teaches improvidence, while Paul condemns it. A little close attention, however, to just what is said will soon show that there is no clash here whatever. Does our Lord in Matt. 6:31, 34 urge us to be lazy, shiftless, wasteful? He does nothing of the kind. What He inculcates is that we must not let our heart "be overcharged with the cares of this life...."

"Overcharged?" Who is Arndt trying to beguile with this ploy. Again we must ask Arndt to read the words lying in front of him. Jesus isn't talking about being overcharged with anything; he's talking about not being charged at all. He forbids any striving. He says, "take NO thought," not reduced thought, a little less thought, or a smaller amount of thought. He says, "No thought" which is another one of those absolutist statements that effectively buries the Bible and its supporters--another one of those absolutist phrases upon whose shores the Bad Ship Bible repeatedly runs aground. For Arndt to say that "Jesus apparently teaches improvidence" can only be deemed an intentional understatement. There is no "apparently" to it. Arndt is most concerned with interpreting words as he prefers them to be.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Letter #778 from MB of Collinsville, Illinois

I was indoctrinated into the Christian religion from an early age, but eventually I began to question some of the illogic that it presented. As a result, I let Christians know my feelings on this controversy. Without surprise, not many Christians showed respect for my views and tried to reveal their "truth" to me. It became irritating to have to defend my disbelief to the arrogant Christians who wanted to save my soul. Thanks to you, I don't defend my disbelief now, but rather I go on the offense and challenge Christians to defend the Bible's flaws.

I came upon your site on the Internet. I am very impressed with your exhaustive research and excellent ability to communicate it. I didn't realize that the Bible was that full of errors until I read some of the BE issues at your site. It is refreshing to read such a rational and objective critique of the Bible. Although I am not an atheist, I personally hold the same feelings as you do with respect to the negative impact Christianity has on our culture. I also feel it is important to give balance to such one-sided false data in society.

I would appreciate it if you could send me your "Encyclopedia of BE." When I get a little more cash I will send for all the "BE issues." If you have more information on other literature you have, such as tracts on biblical falsehoods, I would love to order some.

P.S. I want to cross reference the contradictions right alongside the verses in the Bible. Is this done in published form already? It sure seems to be a valid way to expedite locating the references in a confrontation.

Editor's Response to Letter #778

Dear MB. We appreciate your thoughtful comments and are glad to see you taking the offensive, a policy which we have advocated from the beginning. Indeed, proselytization has been at the core of our philosophy from the outset.

As far as your P.S. is concerned, that is an excellent idea, but unfortunately it represents another one of those books that critics of the Bible need to write but have never brought to fruition. If apologists can have running commentaries on each biblical chapter, verse by verse, why can't we.

For several years I have been pondering the feasibility of an even more poignant tome. I have five large alphabetically-indexed notebooks containing a monumental listing of the Bible's problems on virtually every contradictory topic from Genesis to Revelation. If these notebooks were ever published, they would provide an excellent quick-and-ready resource for biblical critics engaged in debate who needed instance access to relevant quotes. The most potent verses have already been starred or otherwise delineated in many instances to further reduce the amount of time needed for retrieval. Having debated many biblicists over the years and appeared on many radio talk shows, I have learned that it is not sufficient to merely have potent verses for all occasions. One must also be able to find them on very short notice. Arranging and categorizing material for the most efficient acquirement is of critical importance. It does no good to have excellent material if you can't pull it up in those moments that count. Instant access is often critical, as I have learned to my chagrin on several occasions. I had the evidence that mattered but couldn't recover it promptly, in which case I might as well have not had it at all. If you can't locate it at critical moments, all else is for naught. My five notebooks in published form would go a long way toward surmounting this obstacle, a long way indeed. The absence of a narrative would significantly reduce the amount of reading involved and further accelerate the speed at which information could be brought to the fore. When facts, quotes, and citations are what matters, excess verbiage should be minimized. While your proposal would probably sequentially move from verse to verse and chapter to chapter in successive books, mine would dwell primarily on the contradictions, errors, and fallacies associated with ideas and beliefs found throughout Scripture.

CLOSURE

While teaching high school in the 1960's one of my proselytizing students gave me a copy of a simplified version of the NT entitled Good News for Modern Man published by the American Bible Society of New York. After taking several weeks to read the entire book, I was astounded by the number of errors, contradictions, and fallacies contained therein that were all but invisible to biblicists, as I subsequently discovered. While reading the work, I practically covered it with notations, criticisms, and observations only to lay it aside after having written a critique. For several years my interest in Scripture declined dramatically only to be rejuvenated around 1975 when I decided to pursue the matter with much greater intensity and commitment by reading the entire Bible. After purchasing the 4-columned Layman's Parallel Bible and Strong's Exhaustive Concordance, I spent a couple of years meticulously reading the entire book and taking copious notes. In addition, I read scores of biblical critiques by many notable authors such as Remsburg, Wheless, Ingersoll, Paine, and others. From 1975 through 1978 I engaged in an incredible amount of biblical research and note-taking. By 1978 five large notebooks crammed with information and indexed throughout had come to fruition. In effect, I had completed the first phase of an evolving long-term project.

After having compiled a tremendous amount of data, I decided to embark upon the next phase of my protracted project--radio appearances. I called or wrote to hundreds of radio talk show stations throughout the nation, explained to them my overall intent, and received several invitations to appear. From 1978 onward appearing on radio talk shows had a position of high priority on my agenda. In effect, the second phase of my overall strategy was underway.

Because of numerous requests for information while appearing before the public and in order to disseminate my burgeoning body of anti-biblical literature, I decided in the early 1980's to fill an obvious void by embarking upon an ever more ambitious undertaking. A monthly periodical would be created to not only spread the word but correct and enlighten the book's proponents. Once BE was underway and back issues were readily available, the third phase of my overall strategy was complete.

In the mid 1980's I entered the fourth phase of my journey by creating some poignant, anti-biblical pamphlets for distribution to the citizenry at large in order to offset the multitude of pamphlets that are distributed by religionists. That phase was successfully underway within a year.

In the early 1990's I decided our information should not only be available for those who like to read but for those who like to hear conversation, especially while driving an automobile. With that in mind I created many audio tapes of my radio appearances and 24 tape recordings encompassing the essence of my 5 bulbous notebooks. Writing scripts and assembling audible, coherent, and accurate recordings, as well as arranging the recordings of my talk show appearances into lucid, logical scenarios, encompassed nearly two years. When that was accomplished I had, in effect, successfully traversed the 5th phase of my universal strategy.

The sixth phase began in the early 1990's when a subscriber, Dr. Paul Kurtz-president of Prometheus Press, wrote me a letter suggesting I write a book containing a synopsis of my material. Realizing that my 24 audio tapes already contained the kind of information that would meld beautifully into a book, I decided to transform my audio tape scripts in such a manner as to comprise 24 chapters in a reference book with some understandable additions and deletions. After devoting a tremendous amount of time to script adaptations, including 4 solid days of reading galley sheets, I sent the final manuscript to Prometheus for publication in August 1994. With that completed, I could see my entire program was proceeding smoothly and on track. Except for some minor glitches and unforeseen obstacles, everything was progressing according to plan.

The seventh phase of my overall strategy entailed the creation of 100 video tapes to be played on cable access public television stations throughout North America. It was not only my most expansive and ambitious project to-date but the only one requiring hundreds of volunteer supporters and distributors. It began in earnest on Jan 21, 1994, with our first recording session at a television studio and was completed more than four years later in April 1998. Unfortunately, unlike all prior undertakings this phase has met with limited success, despite repeated requests for assistance. For whatever reason, widespread assistance has not been forthcoming. Much to my chagrin I have come to realize that people are either too afraid, too lazy, too unconcerned, too isolated, too immobile, too preoccupied with hobbies and titillations, or too whatever, to become involved. As far as being afraid is concerned, I don't understand their trepidation. My name has been spread all over the continent via thousands of issues and advertisements; I've appeared on scores of radio talk shows, given speeches, and called radio talks shows repeatedly. I've made a hundred video tapes, many of which have appeared in Texas, Arizona, Ohio, California and elsewhere, published a reference book that is now available in many libraries, and done just about anything else I could think of to expose the Bible for the fraud that it is. And, yet, I have never received a serious threat in my entire career. I have been told I am going to hell and I'm doing the devil's handiwork; that kind of nonsense is to be expected. But I have never encountered any kind of serious warnings or threats that would understandably generate concern and apprehension. For some reason or other a lot of anti-religious people in general and anti-Bible people in particular seem to think that there are a horde of religious fanatics out there just looking for an excuse to pounce upon anyone who dares to criticize Scripture. In truth, nearly all biblicists are as indifferent and unconcerned as their opponents when it comes to suppressing their opposition. They are much more inclined toward behind-the-scenes censorship and squelching than direct frontal assaults. As is true of many freethinkers, if energy is required you can include them out. It isn't worth the effort from their perspective.

Moreover, the kind of opposition you receive is often commensurate with the manner in which you project your ideas and beliefs. Referring to biblicists and religionists as ignorant, brainwashed idiots wallowing in a sea of fantasies, dreams, and stupidities will more than likely generate resentment and comparable responses rather than objective, serious contemplation. That kind of language is a direct threat to egos and self-concepts and is bound to foster antagonism and hatred. Embarking upon an ego-trip to vent your frustrations and disgust may create feelings of satisfaction and euphoria, but it is unlikely to materially alter the beliefs of anyone. One can expect walls rather than bridges to arise in abundance with all the accompanying rhetoric, threats, and vituperation. We have always worked on the theory that opponents who are buried in a mountain of facts and data don't have time or interest in becoming ominous or menacing. They are too busy thinking about what you are saying to contemplate more bestial devices.

A few people have come to our aid with respect to playing our tapes and otherwise aiding our cause. Of that there can be no doubt. A few have volunteered time, labor, and funds and for that we are certainly grateful. But the critical, all consuming word is few. A few have done this; a few have done that, but that's not sufficient. Religionists can get tens of thousands of people to travel throughout the world and sacrifice years out of their lives to proselytize and propagandize humanity at considerable personal risk, both financially and physically, and, yet, I can't even get some people to take some video tapes down to their local TV stations once or twice a week and tailor the tapes to the station's particular requirements, free tapes at that. Astounding! The outcome of this phase is that I have learned a valuable lesson in recent years. I may have done my research and learned the Bible extremely well; I may have devised a rational and systematic strategy over the years, I may have generated the amount of personal commitment and resources that are necessary to accomplish what I wanted to do unassisted, I may have had my ducks all lined up in neat little rows, but I failed to factor in an extremely important component--the all but total unwillingness of others to get involved in anything other than reading. I failed to ask myself an extremely important question: Suppose others don't share your exuberance, your determination, your dedication, your commitment. What then? I never really pondered that angle. That was one component that I never really factored in. I just assumed that if people had the appropriate information and realized its potency they would take the ball and run. Instead, thousands have merely thrown it back into my court or ignored catching it altogether. I was so involved in the mechanics of the whole operation that I never even took this possibility into account. To be perfectly candid, I just didn't realize that I had more drive, determination, dedication, and enthusiasm in my chin than thousands of anti-religionists have in their entire body. Tens of thousands aren't willing to research, aren't willing to contribute, aren't willing to participate, aren't willing to dedicate their time to this activity in any serious, meaningful, or ongoing manner. The energy is just not there and that's the bottom line. I have actually had people drop their subscription to BE after having said, I agree with everything you are doing, everything you are saying, and everything you stand for, but I no longer wish to be involved. Good luck. I hope you are successful and I wish you the best. Now how do you deal with that kind of mentality?

In any event, in light of all the above, a decision has been reached, a switch has been thrown, the die has been cast. THE PERIODICAL KNOWN AS BIBLICAL ERRANCY WILL CEASE PUBLICATION ON DECEMBER 31, 1998 after 16 years of circulation. I make this decision with a heavy heart and deep regrets but facts are facts. BE is older than all of my children and is almost like another child. It's enough to turn my stomach. On that key date the last major phase will become one of refunding all unused subscription funds to those from whom we do not receive keep the change letters. After this year we will continue to distribute back issues, audio tapes, video tapes, pamphlets, and our book, but no additional issues of BE will be forthcoming.

In one sense there is a positive side to all of this; a welcome milestone will have been reached. I will no longer have to worry about monthly deadlines, writing well-researched and coherent commentaries, interminable proof-readings, seeking funds, monthly mailings, folding, stapling, mail-labeling hundreds of issues and driving many miles each month to our designated post office, coping with interminable harassments by my postmaster, advertising, extensive bookkeeping, sending out renewal notices, purchasing supplies, constantly asking for non-financial assistance, coping with mistakes caused by constant changes in our printer's personnel, constantly surreptitiously hinting to my wife that some bookkeeping needs to be updated, and imploring her every month to proofread literature that she is not particularly interested in. Moreover, she has so many other commitments and obligations that finding sufficient time in which to become involved has been a significant challenge within itself. Fortunately, her organizational and creative talents have provided a means by which to overcome numerous obstacles, and without her bookkeeping skills and invaluable assistance all these years, BE would never have gotten off the ground. If there is an unsung hero in this whole activity, she is that person.

I am concluding BE not only with deep sorrow but a profound feeling of having let down many loyal subscribers. Many of you have been with us almost from the beginning.

In the end it was not our critics, our opponents, our enemies, if you will, who brought BE to an end; they are easy. It was our allies and compatriots who failed to assist when called upon repeatedly. There can be no doubt that a few of our supporters have given that measure of devotion and commitment so necessary for a successful endeavor, but their number has been too small so far. About the only turn of events that could keep BE going at this juncture would be the influx of so much money that I could employ a staff to distribute, modify, and circulate our tapes and newsletter on a regular basis which would obviate any further need for me to all but beg for assistance. And since I have no millionaire relatives and have never been lucky at picking lottery numbers, I don't see any possibilities in that regard.

Hopefully people in far greater numbers yet to come in American society will not only be considerably more committed to the eradication of religious superstition in general and biblical mythology and deception in particular but find our Encyclopedia and back issues to be of invaluable assistance in their continuing quest for sanity. To all those who did not act, even though they not only failed to face serious obstacles but dropped their subscription while in full agreement with our plans, data, procedures, and philosophy, I respectfully state: Give me a call when you are as serious as a stroke about this whole business. Until then, I can't help but feel that I am spending too much time in what has turned out to be little more than an entertaining avocation, something in which I have no interest and do not wish to be involved. If and when this change of attitude on the part of thousands were ever to occur, I only hope conditions are not beyond the point of possible rectification. Saying I told you so may be self-gratifying but it will be far outweighed by the pain and loss all rational minds will endure.

Most unfortunate is the fact that this summation will probably not be read by those to whom it applies the most--freethinkers who have never subscribed or who have dropped their subscription, despite full agreement with our philosophy. Instead it will be read by our current subscribers to whom it often applies the least.

On a purely practical societal note, all freethinkers should keep in mind that the right wing political figures as... of such prominent public figures as Newt Gingrich, Jessie Helms, Pat Buchanan, Rush Limbaugh, G. Gordon Liddy, and William F. Buckley, to name only a few, is closely allied to the fundamentalism of Pat Robertson, Jerry Falwell, Jimmy Swaggart, and James Robison. As one gains adherents, so does the other. As one loses supporters, so does the other. They are two sides of the same coin, essentially Siamese twins, the basic difference being that one operates primarily in the politico-economic realm while the other concentrates on the socio-religious domain. The intolerance and insensitivity of one is mirrored in that of the other, and if you oppose one, the day could come when you will be oppressed by the other.

In any event, I think it only fair for us to have explained in some detail when BE will cease and why. We certainly owe everyone an explanation.

As far as my future plans are concerned, I will be turning most of the scene over to the knuckle-dragging, ideological Neanderthals who have been poisoning television and radio audiences, as well as parishioners, with their lies, half truths, and distortions for decades and switching over to the Internet, an enterprise that didn't exist when BE began years ago. Until the attitudes, commitments, and philosophies of tens of thousands of freethinkers change dramatically, I will be corresponding via email, spending time surfing newsgroups and chat rooms for opportunities to bring enlightenment to the benighted, and trying to enlist supporters for my cablevision undertaking. The latter enterprise will continue to be accorded the highest priority, despite all obstacles. Our programs may have been created by amateurs and lack the sophistication, pizzazz, and entertainment quality of commercial television, but they provide a degree of religious and biblical accuracy that mainline radio and television programs don't begin to approach.

EDITOR'S NOTE:

Some of you have no doubt already realized that we no longer send out renewal notices. That's because there are so few months remaining. In order to forestall needless refunds, those wishing to resubscribe are being asked to send only $1 for each month remaining in this year.

Issue #187 July 1998, Editor: Dennis McKinsey

COMMENTARY

This month's issue will be devoted entirely to letters from our readers. Last's month's analysis entitled Closure understandably generated more letters, phone calls, and e-mail, both pro and con, than any comments we have ever made. We will not belabor this issue in the remaining months but relevant letters will be interspersed throughout subsequent issues because they either represent the judgments of many or are interesting in their own right.

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

Letter #779 from NB of Tucson, Arizona (Part a)

(In letter #748 (Part f) in the 178th issue I said, "What does color-blindness have to do with the color of something? You mean color does not exist until people can see it. How silly! How myopic! How solipsistic! NB now wishes to reply with--Ed.),

If you don't think color does not exist until people can see it, try asking a person who has been blind from birth what "the red, white and blue" means.

Editor's Response to Letter #779 (Part a)

Leaving aside the convoluted manner in which you phrased your statement, NB, the fact remains that there is a real world out there that could not care less if anyone is present to view its properties. Whether or not people can see, has nothing to do with whether or not color exists. Color is there, pure and simple, and if you can't see it, that of no concern to reality. Do I think color does not exist until people can see it? No, of course not. Color may not exist for a person who has been blind from birth, but that does not mean color does not exist at all. It just means this particular person has no conception of color. For him it does not exist. But it does not mean color does not exist period.

Letter #779 Concludes (Part b)

As for the old "if a tree falls in the forest and no one is there, is there a sound?" controversy, did Beethoven hear a "sound" at the tumultuous premiere of his Ninth Symphony? He had been stone deaf for 20 years.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #779 (Part b)

Whether or not Beethoven heard his symphony has nothing to do with whether or not his symphony emitted sound. There is no connection between the two. If his symphony was played at any decibel level what-ever, then there was sound, regardless of who was present or whether or not they could hear. Frankly, I find all of this solipsistic nonsense not only boring but juvenile. The very idea that sound and color do not exist unless someone is present to witness them is foolish, if not bordering on the absurd.

Letter #780 from DA of La Puente, California (Part a)

(In the Feb. 1998 Issue I criticized the defense Arndt provided for the four different wordings written on the cross. Matt. 27:37 says, 'This is Jesus the King of the Jews.' Mark 15:26 says, 'The King of the Jews.' Luke 23:38 says, 'This is the King of the Jews.' And John 19:19 says, 'Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews.' Then I asked, "So which is it?" Arndt replied by saying, among other things, "This criticism arbitrarily lays down the principle that when one quotes a statement, one must, in order to be faithful to the original, give every word of it. To state this principle is to expose its injustice. Nothing is more common in all human languages than to abridge a speech, or a remark which one is quoting...." To that I said, "Regardless of how often speech is abridged, there can only be one correct wording." DA now wishes to come to Arndt's defense by saying--Ed),

This is correct only if you add "...per speaker and/or listener.' Once we acknowledge that each writer is a different individual with different interests and is speaking to difference (sic) audiences with even more different interests, we find that a great many abridgements are correct, even if only one is correct for a given set of author (sic) and audience (sic)."

Editor's Response to Letter #780 (Part a)

With all due respect, DA, what does all that gibberish have to do with anything? Who cares how many speakers, audiences and interests are involved! They are all immaterial, if not irrelevant. The fact is that there can only be one wording on the cross and there can be only one correct duplication of that wording. I don't care how you are tailoring it to the interests or idiosyncrasies of anyone or any group; if you change the wording from what actually existed, then it becomes erroneous, period.

Incidentally, I wish you would be as concerned with proofreading what you are writing, as you are with not proving what you are writing.

Letter #780 Continues (Part b)

(In my fourth criticism of Arndt in the Feb. 1998 issue regarding the different inscriptions on the cross I stated, "Arndt says, 'One glance suffices to show that among the four versions there is no difference in meaning' when there most assuredly is. Neither Mark nor Luke identify the person on the cross as Jesus. At least not from the superscription per se. DA again leaps to Arndt's defense by saying--Ed.),

You assert a difference on the grounds that "Neither Mark nor Luke identify the person on the cross as Jesus.... That assumption is only made because Matthew and John use the word Jesus specifically." Both statements are simply wrong. Mark 15:26 does not contain the word "Jesus", true, but he is the central figure of Mark 15. Any reading of 15:26 that says someone other than Jesus is under discussion is simply nonsense. This means also that one does not need to consider Matthew or John to know Jesus is the subject in Mark and Luke

By excluding the ending of my statement you failed to quote me accurately. I said, "Neither Mark nor Luke identify the person on the cross as Jesus. At least not from the superscription per se." Notice, I said "from the superscription per se" which you conveniently excluded. Anyone who looked only at the inscriptions in Mark and Luke would not know Jesus was the one being crucified. Other data is required.

Letter #780 Continues (Part c)

(In the 182nd [Feb. 1998] issue DA attacked a remark in the 2nd Issue of BE. He stated, "The Second Issue of BE [Feb. 1983] had a number of simple errors such as in your reference to 2 Kings 13:21 when you talk about a "grave" when it was a tomb." To that I replied, "If you had bothered to read any of the literature, other than that within your narrow purview, you would have noticed that the NEB, the NAB, the NASB, the RSV, and the Modern Language all say 'grave.' Are you saying your scholars are more knowledgeable than those who composed these versions?" DA now seeks to follow up his comments with--Ed.)

This is one of your constant fallacies, argument from authority. Which set of authorities is more knowledgeable is irrelevant. The question is which is right (which can be neither).

Editor's Response to Letter #780 (Part c)

You certainly got this one twisted around. You are the one arguing from authority, not I. I am merely asking you which of your biblical authorities is correct. That is your problem to sort out, not mine. I cited some authorities to prove my point and you are contending others could be more accurate. All you are doing is substantiating my point. You say, "The question is which is right (which can be neither)." That is precisely my argument. That could very well be true; so how do you know what your book is saying. Remember what I said to you in the April issue. Perhaps you forgot, so I will refresh your memory: "I am under no obligation to nail down the wording of your book. Let me repeat that. I am under no obligation to provide the correct wording of your book. You, on the other hand, are saddled with that horrible burden." Later I said, "You are admitting that biblicists not only don't know what the text says but that you don't either. Therefore that part of Scripture is, for all practical purposes, worthless and should be expunged from the Bible.... True, you can't prove a contradiction if you can't be sure of the wording. But if you can't be sure of the wording, then that part of Scripture becomes useless and should be expelled."

Letter #780 Continues (Part d)

(In the February 1998 issue I said to DC of St. Paul, Minn., "You criticize me for mentioning the contradiction between Matt. 1:16 which says Joseph's father is Jacob and Luke 3:23 which says his father is Heli by saying, 'your note of the Matt. 1:16 vs. Luke. 3:23 ignores known Jewish customs.' To this I said, "Really? Such as what? You mean the Jews had a custom in which two men could have the same son?" DA now wants to come to DC's defense by saying--Ed.), Actually the Jews did, and do, and so does just about every other society. Go have a talk with most any adoptee and ask "who is your father?" You are quite likely to get a flat claim of having 2 fathers (one by birth and one by legal adoption.) Any attempt to dispute that is apt to get a distinctly unfriendly response, and rightly so. The two may be fathers in different ways, but they both merit the term and any attempt to insist only one is the father is clearly wrong.

Editor's Response to Letter #780 (Part d)

First, I am sorry to disillusion you, DA, but we have only one father. What people choose to call foster parents, adopting parents, step-fathers, etc. is their choice to make. But the fact remains that we have only one father. According to your logic, if I chose to refer to my neighbor or my teacher as my father, he would, in fact, be such. Hardly! Legal papers can alter the wording in whatever matter they deem desirable, but they can't change biology. What is that old conundrum: A duck by any other name.... You are substituting emotions, feelings, desires, and preferences for objective reality. Sorry to be so clinical and detached but facts are facts.

Second, you say "they both merit the term." They may both merit it, but only one has it. You can arbitrarily alter the terminology, but you can't alter the situation.

Third, you state "any attempt to insist only one is the father is clearly wrong." In truth, any attempt to insist anyone is the father other than the male who contributed to his birth is wrong. Under your ridiculous scenario an individual could have hundreds of fathers should he choose to so label them or should the legal paperwork so designate.

Letter #780 Continues (Part e)

(In the February 1998 issue I discussed the biblical concept of adultery and EK's assertion that ONLY if the woman is married is adultery a factor. DA now seeks to come to EK's defense by alleging--Ed.),

Among the several weaknesses of your claim is what EK points out, that nothing done to the women in Exodus 20:14 constituted adultery under the OT definition. The male could have sex with any number of women without committing adultery as long as none of the women were married or engaged.

Editor's Response to Letter #780 (Part e)

I'll tell you what I told EK, DA. Where does Scripture say this is not adultery? Where does Scripture say that adultery ONLY occurs when the woman involved is married or engaged.

Letter #780 Continues (Part f)

Since you like argument from authority, we start by quoting several: Harper's Bible Dictionary 1985, page 14, "In the OT, adultery had a precise and limited definition... Sexual relations between a married woman and any man other than her husband." New Standard Bible Dictionary 1936, page 555. "We nowhere read anything to the effect he (husband) was forbidden extramarital intercourse with other women." Expository Dictionary of Bible Words 1985, page 21, "Adultery is intercourse with or by a married or engaged woman." Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible 1962, page 51, "violation of a husband's right to have sole sexual possession of his wife..." Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible 1963, page 38, "He was guilty of adultery only when he had extramatrimonial relations with a married...or betrothed woman." Oxford Dictionary of the Bible 1996, page 7, "...adultery...man having sex with a married woman."

Editor's Response to Letter #780 (Part f)

First, not I, but you are the one repeatedly relying upon authority, as these citations demonstrate. You, like millions of biblicists, also cite the Bible as the ultimate authority.

Second, according to you Harper's Bible Dictionary says, "In the OT, adultery had a precise and limited definition... Sexual relations between a married woman and any man other than her husband." So I will ask you and Harper's where that definition is to be found in Scripture. Are we going to go by the Bible or Harpers.

Third, you cite the New Standard Bible Dictionary which says, "We nowhere read anything to the effect he (husband) was forbidden extramarital intercourse with other women." By the same token, where does it say it was permissible? Where does it say it was not adultery?

Moreover, all too often your thought processes are inconsistent DA, because you are now citing a source that deviates from your premise. You earlier stated (verbatim), "The male could have sex with any number of women without committing adultery, as long as none of the women were married or engaged. Now you are citing a dictionary that says a husband can have sex with any women, married or not. There are no restrictions. It says "other women" and that can mean either married or unmarried.

Fourth, then you cite the Expository Dictionary of Bible Words which says, "Adultery is intercourse with or by a married or engaged woman." Does that say ONLY sex by a married or engaged woman is adultery? Even more importantly, does SCRIPTURE say adultery ONLY occurs when sex is performed by a married or engaged woman? If so, where?

Fifth, you cite the Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible which says, "violation of a husband's right to have sole sexual possession of his wife..." Is that saying that is the ONLY situation under which adultery can occur. If so, where is that stated in Scripture?

Also you earlier stated, the male could have sex with any number of women without committing adultery, as long as none of the women were married or engaged. This Interpreters Dictionary, which you are citing, is not supporting you with respect to engaged women. Where does it say adultery occurs if the woman involved is merely engaged?

And sixth, you cite the Oxford Dictionary of the Bible which says according to you, "...adultery...man having sex with a married woman." Again does that mean adultery can ONLY occur if a man has relations with a married woman. Where does the Bible state as much? You are not doing very well, even with your own sources.

Letter #780 Continues (Part g)

You wish to argue from Prov. 6:32 and Matt. 5:28 that since both lack the qualifier "married", adultery with an unmarried woman is possible. But you are arguing from silence, always a weak argument....

Editor's Response to Letter #780 (Part g)

Sooner or later you are bound to get it right, DA. I am not arguing from silence; I am questioning. I want to know where the Bible says, "If, and ONLY if, the woman is married can adultery occur." I cited Prov. 6:32 and Matt. 5:28 because they leave open the possibility of a man committing adultery with an unmarried female. The latter is especially strong in that regard because it says "...whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." Notice it does not say the woman must be married. It just says a woman, period. That's not an argument from silence. You, on the other hand, are contending that "The male could have sex with any number of women without committing adultery, as long as none of the women were married or engaged." Again, where does Scripture say involvement by a married man with unmarried women is not adultery? I cited Matt. 5:28 which states that to even contemplate the thought is adulterous, let alone commit the act.

All of this harkens back to what I originally said in the February 1998 issue, "The basic problem is that the Bible does not clearly and emphatically support either of our positions. The Bible says, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," but nowhere does it clearly and unequivocally define exactly what adultery entails. And because it is not clearly defined, my position is more reliable than yours. Only by producing a verse stating adultery only occurs when a man has relations with a married female can you hope to salvage your stance." And that, DA, you have failed to accomplish.

Letter #780 Concludes (Part h)

Now the Bible may not "clearly and unequivocally define exactly what adultery entails", but the implications are clear enough. We have Hosea 4:13-14 "...daughters play the wanton...brides commit adultery." We have Lev. 20:10 "If a man commits adultery with his neighbor's wife, both...shall be put to death." and Exodus 22:16-17 "When a man seduces a virgin who is not yet betrothed, he shall pay the bride price..." In both and other places, we have the married woman linked to "adultery", a word that is not used to describe similar conduct by the unmarried. It takes deliberate effort to avoid the conclusion that adultery involves a married (or engaged) woman, and does not occur when a man, married or not, has sex with a slave girl of his....

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #780 (Part h)

You say, "it takes deliberate effort to avoid the conclusion that adultery involves a married (or engaged) woman, and does not occur when a man, married or not has sex with a slave-girl of his...." To begin with you stated the original problem incorrectly. There is no problem involved in concluding that when a married woman is engaged in extramarital sex, adultery is occurring. But the original issue is whether or not adultery can ONLY occur if a married woman is involved, a problem you have seen fit to dodge throughout your monologue. And you completely ignored what is stated in Matt. 5 ("...whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart."). It does not say the woman must be married.

And finally why did you even cite Ex. 22:16-17, since it is referring to an unbetrothed virgin, not a married woman? You say "it takes deliberate effort to avoid the conclusion that adultery involves a married (or engaged) woman..." when the only "deliberate effort" involved is coming to your conclusion that the virgin discussed in Ex. 22:16-17 somehow substantiates your position. If anything, it proves the opposite.

I can use this citation, however, by asking: If no adultery is involved, then why is the man required to pay the bride price for seducing a virgin? If it was not adultery, then what was it, and why was it illegal?

In any event, we have belabored this issue sufficiently and it is time to conclude the discussion. As I told EK in February 1998, until someone can produce a verse or verses that clearly say adultery can ONLY occur when the woman involved is married, there is no need to continue.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #781 from WS of Baton Rouge, Louisiana (Part a)

Dear Dennis: Your excellent critique of DA's letter in issue 184 contained two points that I should comment on.

DA's claim that Egypt's climate once was wetter is not his invention. Sources I've read over the years say the region has been slowly drying for millennia. That southern Egypt once had more rainfall than today is shown by the presence of rain spouts on temples built more than 2,000 years ago. They don't need the spouts today; the spouts must have been necessary back then.

Editor's Response to Letter #781 (Part a)

Dear WS. You may be correct but I have never seen any statements to this effect in my readings. Are you sure they were rain spouts and did not serve some other purpose? Everything I have seen and read indicates Egypt was as dry 4,000 years ago as it is now. But not being an expert, I will defer to your judgment.

Letter #781 Concludes (Part b)

However, we're not talking about monsoons, only somewhat more frequent rainstorms than the rare precipitation today. I can find no reference to any rivers in historic times in any of my books on Egypt. The Nile cut a valley across a desert. On both sides of the narrow strip of vegetated riverbottom land is bone-dry desert, a desert that comes right to the riverbank in parts of southern Egypt. If the wadis were riverbeds, even only for part of each year, they would be lined with vegetation. DA is leaning on a weak reed when he takes a reference to higher rainfall in ancient times to mean that Egypt is an African version of Louisiana.

Which brings me to the bayous. Forget the dictionary. Bayou is a vague term that covers channels of water that, in other areas, would be called creeks or rivers, depending upon their size. Some bayous will barely hold a canoe; others are shipping channels. Does DA claim Egypt has bayous? Show me.

The main branches of the Mississippi at its mouth are called passes. The Mississippi also sends out smaller streams across the mud flats near its mouths, and I've found one reference to them as 'bayous,' which may be what inspired DA's comment. But these are not independent rivers, merely smaller branches of Big Muddy. A branch is not a river, simply one of several channels used by a river at its mouth. The Nile has these too, but they're not separate rivers. At Cairo, the Nile is split into two parts by an island. Is DA going to claim these are two separate rivers?

It's true that the Nile is formed from two rivers, but they merge in the Sudan, in an area that was not a part of Egypt in the Bronze or Iron ages by anyone's geography. What the Mississippi/Atchafalaya problem has to do with Egypt is beyond me. The Nile certainly isn't trying to mate with the Jordan River, unlike our two rambunctious rivers here (pardon my anthropomorphism). DA was obviously desperate to throw something into the breach in his arguments, no matter how useless.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #781 (Part b)

I wish you would tell all of that to DA. Considering the fact that you live in the land of the bayous, the probability is high that you are more qualified to discuss the topic than he. I've decided he's beyond salvation because his ego won't allow reality to precede his presuppositions. He'd rather resist than desist.

Letter #782 from JB Via Email

(In the May 1998 issue we related the conversation JB had with his pastor as a result of having left the church and Christianity. What follows is the advice JB gave to one of his in-laws regarding what to say if the minister should call. JB says),

Now that I have backed my former pastor into a corner, I wouldn't be surprised if he calls you. He may send an e-mail, but he will probably use the phone instead. He will probably offer you some perspective from which to view my disbelief, likely saying that I am rebelling against God because of some hidden inner conflict, and/or that Satan is attacking me. He will likely tell you that I am misunderstanding and misusing scripture, and that there is really nothing behind the challenges I have raised. He may say that I am raising the issues only to hide behind them, because the real issue is some emotional or spiritual conflict, and he may use the word "smokescreen." He may assure you that all the questions I have raised have answers, and if you seem troubled by my challenges, he might even refer you to some apologetic books. He will likely offer you some high-sounding but vacuous assurances that, yes, Christianity is indeed true.

What he probably WON'T do is to answer the challenges I have raised, at least not in a serious way. If he does try to "answer" some of my challenges, ask yourselves why he is answering only to you and not to me. Does he know that I will expose his "answers" and show they are absurd? You see, ministers tend to avoid discussing whether Christianity is TRUE or FALSE, because they know they cannot defend the "truth" of Christianity. Instead, they ASSUME that Christianity is true and carry their listeners along on this assumption. I expect him, as I would expect most evangelical ministers, to avoid talking about whether or not Christianity is TRUE, and instead to try to turn your focus onto hypothetical emotional conflicts, or attacks of Satan, or character flaws in ME. If he does this, ask yourselves whether weaknesses in me, even if true, have any bearing at all on whether or not Christianity is true. I think you can agree with me that even if I were a murderous, lying, cheating scoundrel, the challenges to Christianity that I have raised stand on their own merit and deserve serious answers. The net effect of his call will be that he will have gotten himself off the hook, and won't have to answer my challenges, because he will have persuaded you that my challenges to the truth of Christianity are not the real issue. He will be taking advantage of the fact that as believers you are already inclined to accept his explanation and perspective. If you read this message before he calls, may I suggest that you not accept his explanation and perspective at face value? Instead, may I suggest that you tell him you would like to see him respond to ME by e-mail with serious answers to my challenges relevant to the question of whether Christianity is true or false? If you do, then watch for him to subtly discount the validity of your request, probably by rehashing some of what he has already told you. But do you think it is really too much to ask of an ordained minister of the gospel, trained at seminary, to defend the truth of Christianity? Why not press for an answer? And why would a trained minister avoid answering, anyway, if the truth of Christianity could be defended?

Letter #783 from FA of Santa Rosa, California (Part a)

Dear Dennis. In letter #772 JT erroneously wrote that I said "Jesus never missed a meal" and then quotes Matthew 4:2 about Jesus and his 40 day fast which shows he missed 120 meals. And you agreed with him! It seems that both of you failed to read what I wrote: "... at no time in his life did he [Jesus] ever miss a meal--except by his own choice." In my opinion it was "by his own choice" that Jesus fasted 40 days.

Editor's Response to Letter #783 (Part a)

Dear FA. Now I remember why I never challenged you when I originally read your statement. I noticed you had that proviso attached. When JT later came along and accused you of making an error, I went along with JT's analysis without rechecking your comment. JT owes you an apology, as do I.

Letter #783 Concludes (Part b)

Actually the story about Jesus fasting for 40 days raises several problems about Jesus. 1) If Jesus was just a man he would have starved to death before the 40 days ended. 2) If Jesus was God he would not have been hungry before, during, or after 40 days. and 3) If Jesus was both man and God he could not be a model for us because we are not part God.... In my opinion the story is not be accepted as factual.

Editor's Concluding Response to Letter #783 (Part b)

We felt an obligation to print your remonstrance FA, because a correction was in order. No one likes to be quoted inaccurately, including myself.

Erratum: On the first page of last month's issue I incorrectly quoted Ecclesiastes 7:12. It says the "Spirit shall return to God," not the "dust shall return," as I stated. Therefore, my fourth point should be ignored. But the other three points, especially the first and second, are more than sufficient to expose a major contradiction. As I said in point 4(B), "If this ruse were valid, (which it appears to be and is, thus, no longer a ruse-Ed.), then we would only have returned to square one because man would, in fact, have 'preeminence above a beast'" and we would all not be going to "one place."

When I start making errors as simple as this, I can't help but feel it really is time to reassess.

REVIEW

DOES THE BIBLE CONTRADICT ITSELF?--(Part 6)

This month's issue will conclude our extended critique of Arndt's prominent apologetic work entitled Does the Bible Contradict Itself?

On page 153 Arndt addresses the contradiction between Mark 13:32 ("But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father") and John 21:17 ("Jesus saith unto him the third time, Simon, Son of Jonas, lovest thou Me? Peter was grieved because He said unto him the third time, Lovest thou Me? And he said unto Him, Lord thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love Thee....").

Arndt states, "The one passage ascribes omniscience to Jesus; the other denies that He, the Son, knew the day and the hour when the Last Judgment will take place. Let the reader carefully note when each one of these statements was made. When Peter said to Jesus, 'Lord, Thou knowest all things,' the days of suffering for our Lord were passed and the resurrection had taken place; but the words of Jesus Himself, saying that the Son did not know the time of the Last Judgment, were spoken before His great Passion and His victorious return to life.... The Bible distinguishes between Jesus before and after His resurrection. Before His resurrection He had made Himself of no reputation, took upon Himself the form of a servant, and humbled Himself, Phil. 2:7-8. After His resurrection His status changed: 'God hath highly exalted Him and given Him a name which is above every name,' Phil. 2:9. ...while Jesus before His suffering and death was invested with all the divine attributes, He did not during this period of humiliation use His divine majesty fully and uninterruptedly. He possessed omniscience, but according to His human nature He was content to forego its use except on certain occasions. When He says the Son does not know the date of the Judgment, a glimpse is afforded into the depth of His humiliation entered upon for us, which made Him refrain from exercising the divine powers He possessed...."

Arndt appears to have decided to shield Jesus from critics like me by denying a major aspect of his essential nature.

First, he states, "The Bible distinguishes between Jesus before and after His resurrection. Before His resurrection He had made Himself of no reputation, took upon Himself the form of a servant, and humbled Himself, Phil. 2:7-8. After His resurrection His status changed: 'God hath highly exalted Him and given Him a name which is above every name,' Phil. 2:9."

We are talking about the knowledge of Jesus. Where do these verses say that his knowledge of events changed or improved? Nowhere does scripture assert that the Resurrection caused the kind of change Arndt is alleging. Why would it?

Moreover, Jesus is god and god by definition knows all at all times. He's omniscient. God is not in the business of learning or acquiring information. Whether or not he made a reputation and humbled himself is irrelevant. He either knew or he didn't. At no time was he not God; therefore, at no time could he not have known.

Second, Arndt says, "...while Jesus before His suffering and death was invested with all the divine attributes, He did not during this period of humiliation use His divine majesty fully and uninterruptedly." The question is not whether he used it or not. The question is whether he had it or not. And he must have had it, since he's god. Again, he either knew or he didn't.

And third, Arndt says, "He possessed omniscience, but according to His human nature He was content to forego its use except on certain occasions." Yet, Mark 13:32, says he didn't have omniscience, period, not that he merely refrained from using it.

Moving to our last example, on page 162 Arndt attempts to reconcile the clash between Gal. 6:10 ("As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith") and 2 John 10, 11 ("If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him Godspeed; for he that biddeth him Godspeed is partaker of his evil deeds"). Arndt states, "Can it be justly charged that Paul and John contradict each other here? Paul enjoins the Christians to do good to all man. John forbids them to take a man into their houses and bid him Godspeed who does not teach the true doctrine of Christ. Paul, it might be thought, shows himself tolerant and abounding in love; John, quite intolerant and hardhearted. The simple fact is that the two Apostles are speaking of two altogether different situations. Paul is discussing our duty toward those who are in need of our help; John speaks of our attitude toward false teachers. To understand the much-maligned injunction of John, we must remember that many false teachers were molesting the Christian Church in those days attempting to impose their heretical notions about the person of Jesus on the Christians. When they came into a town to carry on their pernicious propaganda, was it right for one who believed in the deity of Christ to offer his house to them as their headquarters? A proper conception of truthfulness and sincerity and of devotion to a great cause will not approve of such abetting of doctrines which we have to consider false and dangerous. Can we wish an advocate of a false religion Godspeed, just as though he and we were good friends, brethren and allies? That would be denying the truth...."

John is positive in demanding that his readers should not identify themselves with the wickedness which these false prophets became guilty of. In short, the principle based on the above passage is: Love everybody, love your enemies; but do not approve of, and abet their errors." Although this scenario is what Arndt wishes the text said, the words convey a different message.

First, Arndt says, "Paul is discussing our duty toward those who are in need of our help" which is erroneous because the text clearly says we are to "do good to all men" not just those in need of help.

Second, Arndt says, "The simple fact is that the two Apostles are speaking of two altogether different situations. Paul is discussing our duty toward those who are in need of our help; John speaks of our attitude toward false teachers." Since the former includes the latter according to biblical theology, Arndt's distinction is without substance and they are by no means "altogether different situations."

Third, Arndt says, "To understand the much-maligned injunction of John, we must remember that many false teachers were molesting the Christian Church in those days attempting to impose their heretical notions about the person of Jesus on the Christians." This is immaterial as Paul referred to "all men."

He continues, "When they came into a town to carry on their pernicious propaganda, was it right for one who believed in the deity of Christ to offer his house to them as their headquarters?" According to Paul the answer is yes. Paul did not say you had to wish them Godspeed. He said "let us do good to all men" which does not entail a distinction between those who are false teachers and those who are not. Refusing to offer one's hand is not doing good to "all men."

Fourth, Arndt says John "is positive in demanding that his readers should not identify themselves with the wickedness which these false prophets became guilty. In short, the principle based on the above passage is: Love everybody, love your enemies; but do not approve of, and abet their errors." But Paul never commanded this. He didn't say you had to join them or become one of them. This is not even the issue. Paul said "let us do good to all men" and he did not exclude those who were propounding false or anti-Christian doctrines. Paul says, "Let us do good unto all men, 'especially' unto them who are of the household of faith," not "only" to those who are of the household of faith.

And finally, John refers to "those who bring not this doctrine" which does not necessarily include false teachers, because it could very well be referring to those who are not bringing any doctrines at all. Or they could be bringing doctrines which they are making no attempt to teach.

That concludes our multi-issue assessment of Arndt's apologetic work entitled Does the Bible Contradict Itself?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #784 from JB Via Email

(Last month we published the advice JB gave to one of his in-laws regarding what to say if JB's former pastor should call. The following letter was written by JB in response to some comments made by JB's former pastor in a letter to JB's in-laws, primarily JB's father-in-law.

The Pastor says, Dear P & S [JB's in-laws], My heart breaks with you over the circumstances with JB. Make no mistake, JB is wholly culpable for the direction of his family.

JB replies, Responsible, yes, but I have nothing for which to be culpable. If I continued to teach them a religion that I now know to be false, then I would be culpable.

The Pastor says, JB is rejecting God because God has not acted nor communicated to us in ways that JB feels is reasonable.

JB replies, Well, it is more than this. The alleged communications extant from God are UNreasonable. It is only because Christians are told by ministers, parents and others whom they trust, that the Bible is God's Word that they are willing to overlook the problems in it and convince themselves that they just don't have enough knowledge of their own to understand what God means. The real problems with the Bible are, in this way, transformed into problems of the reader so that the reader blames himself or herself, when the Bible is really to blame. But what sense does it make for God to endow us with reason, and then expect us to believe an inconsistent, contradictory, incoherent Revelation?

The Pastor says, I have no doubt that JB is angry with God.

JB says, You may have no doubt, but it is not true. I covered this in my previous message. And who are YOU to tell ME what I feel, contradicting my own description of what I feel or don't feel? Your entire interaction with me has been condescending, very unbecoming for a minister of God.

The Pastor says, I suspect long ago JB felt conflicted over incidents in his life that he felt a loving God should not/would not have allowed to happen. You may know him well enough to suspicion such life experiences.

JB replies, This is a theme that you (JB's father-in-law) wrote in your first letter to me, also. It's not true, but let's grant for the moment that it is, for the sake of argument. Let me ask you this. If I am angry with God because there has been some conflict in my past, what bearing does this have on the question of whether or not Christianity is true? It has no bearing at all. The question of whether Christianity is true stands totally independent of my very existence, much less any conflict or anger I might have. Even if I had never been born, the question of whether Christianity is true or false still stands.

The Pastor says, Whatever his reasons.

JB replies, I told you the reasons very clearly in my earlier messages. But you have no choice but to deny that my reasons are valid because the foundation of your religion would crumble if you accepted them as true.

The Pastor says, JB is at war with the God he preaches (now) does not exist. That's a no-win conflict for JB.

JB replies, False. I'm not at war with a phantom god. I am defending myself against the scorn of my in-laws by demonstrating to them that my unbelief is reasonable.

[To P and S, my in-laws]. By the way, I am content for you to remain in your belief. I only want you to have a reason to respect me again, and I'm trying to give you that reason by letting you see that I have come to my own personal unbelief competently, not as a whim or in emotional reaction to something in my past experience. And, in case there is any question in any-one's mind, I am also content to remain in my UNbelief. If you think I am experiencing any internal struggle because of it, you are mistaken. I can't say it any plainer than this.

The Pastor says, My encouragement to you is simply to continue to pray for JB, his wife and the kids. JB will continue to use "reason" as his moral high-ground.

JB replies, Well, I'll give you this, R [my former pastor] -- you're not spouting the sophistries of the Christian apologists now -- you're going exactly contrary to them. The apologists make a career out of attempting to show that Christianity is REASONABLE. It was Josh McDowell himself who said, if I may paraphrase, "My heart cannot worship what my mind cannot accept." I am willing to return to Christianity if it can be shown to be reasonable. I'm not asking anyone to show that Christianity is TRUE, but only REASONABLE (but you will not have done this if you leave my challenges unanswered). But is any one of YOU willing to leave Christianity if I can show that it is UNREASONABLE? Until you become willing to do this, then it is unfair to even ask me to return to Christianity, because you expect me to take all the risk for the outcome of testing the truthfulness of Christianity. Furthermore, if you are unwilling to do this, then you are being IRRATIONAL, by definition. Sorry to put it so bluntly, but you need to see the difference between following the truth no matter where it leads, as contrasted with making all the evidence fit a preconceived notion, which the human mind, being very flexible in this regard, can do. So, R [my former pastor], go ahead and disparage reason in a backhanded way. I, on the other hand, will disparage irrationality plainly and clearly.

The Pastor says, He wants to debate.

JB replies, No, I am not looking for a debate. Look at my response to your last paragraph below for an explanation of what I have done, because I have accomplished what I set out to do. Do you see it yet?

The Pastor says, I suggest that this level of deception is conquered only by fasting and prayer. He is already familiar with the truth of God's word.

JB replies, Well, not quite. I'm already familiar with the FALLACIES of "God's Word," and that's why anyone who wants to maintain his or her own faith must retreat to fasting and prayer, and telling oneself that JB is "deceived." Engaging oneself in a sincere debate over the fallacies of "God's Word" will almost certainly lead to the loss of one's own faith.

The Pastor says, Because JB has requested a defense of my belief in God and Christianity (separate issues) I am sending him a video debate entitled, Atheism Versus Christianity. I am sending you a copy as well.

JB replies, A debate! Let me guess -- you picked one in which the atheist made a poor showing and lost the debate. Debates are good for raising issues in a lively and entertaining way to get people to begin thinking for themselves, but they are no good at all for establishing truth. This is because the outcome of a debate usually depends much more on the skill and preparation of the debater than the subject matter under debate.

P [my father-in-law], my previous offer to you still stands. I'll watch this video if you will read or watch something of my choosing. If you agree to my condition, then I'll hunt down a transcript, a videotape, or an audiotape of a debate in which the atheist won. They're not too hard to find.

And R [my former pastor], don't accuse me of being unwilling to watch the video. I am willing, but I have to get something of value in exchange, tit for tat. That's fair, especially since I spent 23 years reading, listening, and looking at pro-Christian materials exclusively. If this videotape is "different" from the rest and "really" answers the issues, then it will be simple to get me to view it. P [my father-in-law] only has to read, view, or listen to one item of my choosing.

The Pastor says, Also, I will be sending some follow up questions and answers on paper that were not covered in the debate.

JB says, I hope they cover MY challenges that I raised in my previous messages. For 23 years I let the Christian church set the agenda and dance all around the real issues without ever addressing them directly. Now I'M setting the agenda.

The Pastor says, In the final analysis JB is already firmly rooted in his deception.

JB replies, "Deception" again. Say it enough and my in-laws will believe it. The "firmly rooted" part is right. I methodically studied the Bible and church doctrine for 23 years, and so I am intimately aware of the problems.

The Pastor says, God can and is willing to deliver him, but JB must turn to God.

JB replies, Which, being translated, means that I must accept God not only without reason, but contrary to reason. Begging the question is an elementary logical fallacy, but theism and Christianity depend on it for their existence.

The Pastor says, JB is not simply a victim.

JB replies, Correct. I am not a victim. I used to be a victim of the Christian delusion, but not anymore. I have raised a number of serious issues which you obviously can't answer, not because of any deficiency on your part, but because they are unanswerable. I still do not hold any animosity toward you, despite my tough talk. If you open your Bible one day and find that your faith has evaporated, like I did, I offer myself as a friend to help you deal with it. I promise not to expose your unbelief, unless you give the word, and I know how to put you in contact with people and resources that can ease the transition away from a life of faith. Right now you think it can never happen, and perhaps you never will lose faith, but if you do, look me up.

The Pastor says, He has willingly taken up an argument against God as creator. He is like a kid waving his finger in the face of God yelling, "prove it! I dare you!".

JB replies, This is not my attitude at all, as you will see when I explain below what I have done.

The Pastor says, The fact is God has and is proving that he exists (Romans 1).

JB says, Referencing the Bible as proof begs the question -- again.

The Pastor says, Again, I hurt deeply with you.

JB says, Yes, all of us have hurt deeply. Christianity takes such a grip on people's lives, that it is very hurtful indeed to discover that it is a false religion or to lose a friend or family member to irrationality. A more sensible religion would scorn people only for misdeeds, not misbeliefs. If I had kept my unbelief secret and kept up with going through all the Christian motions, no one would have seen any difference in me, and all would be well, even though I disbelieved. But, because I have acknowledged my unbelief openly, I am branded immoral with no evidence at all of any other misdeed. Incredible! This religion rewards you for keeping up a lie and punishes you for telling the truth!

The Pastor says, And I will pray for God's miraculous and undeniable intervention.

JB replies, Miracles have their own problems, but there's no use clogging up the works with a critique of miracles at this time. Let me just say that if I were to come back to faith, your assumption of its being miraculous would be unjustified. My return would easily be explained, as I said previously, by my losing my ability to reason, which could happen through brain damage from a car accident or by natural senility, for example.

The Pastor says, I fear for JB sincerely. He does not realize what he's doing.

JB replies, I remained a Christian for 23 years because I DID realize the consequences. If Hell were real, anyone would be a fool to dismiss the only Entity who could keep him out of it. Despite the fact that Christians don't talk much about Hell anymore, the fear of it still keeps many people in the faith, as it did me. It took a boatload of solid evidence to move me beyond that fear into disbelief. It was the fear of Hell that kept me from leaving the faith on only a few inconsistencies, but, as I said in my previous message, I found that the intellectual bankruptcy of Christianity, including the doctrine of Hell, was pandemic and profound. That discovery completely liberated me from any residual fear of Hell. And the weight of the evidence I have collected as a result of fearing Hell makes my present position unassailable to those who would presume to turn me back.

The Pastor says, I will be satisfied to send JB the information I've referred to. I will get those materials out as soon as possible. JB will likely keep trying to bully me into a debate. God's not asked me to play that part. I feel no compunction or desire to do so. I am sick over this. My battle tactics on behalf of JB and his wife (other than sending this initial material) will be with acts of wisdom and prayer.

JB replies, OK, let me explain why I'm not interested in a debate. I have already accomplished what I set out to do, which was to show that you are unwilling to defend the truth of Christianity. You are willing enough to defend Christianity under the ASSUMPTION that it is true, but you are not willing to defend the question of whether Christianity itself is really TRUE or FALSE. I don't need a debate, because I've already won what I was after. You gave it to me on a silver platter when you said, "God's not asked me to play that part," (how convenient for you) and, "I feel no compunction or desire to do so." Sorry to rub it in, but I don't want my in-laws to miss the significance of what has happened here. You, an ordained minister of the gospel, trained at seminary, "feel no compunction or desire" to defend the truth of Christianity, not even to retrieve a lost sheep strayed from your own congregation! As for "bullying" you, my taunts to you were measured to get YOU to respond, not to shake my finger at God. I needed some kind of response from you to draw this exchange to a resolution for my in-laws' sake. AND THE RESOLUTION IS THIS, THAT MY CHALLENGES TO CHRISTIANITY STAND UNANSWERED. It's not your fault, though, R [my former pastor], as the many challenges to Christianity are unanswerable. You've done the only thing you could do, which was to extract yourself from a losing battle. You got yourself off the hook for more abuse, and did some damage control with my in-laws on your way out. No doubt, God will take care of the rest, yes?

The Pastor says, P.S. By the way, the "shunning" by me of the member which JB is referring to was over a married man who fondled a teenage girl in our church. He worked with our youth. He admitted it to me in private, but later denied it in public to spare his marriage. I obeyed the biblical guidelines in that entire matter. I just wanted you to know that.

JB concludes, True, but irrelevant to the point I was making in my previous message, which was that you threatened me with blackmail. Worse yet, the "biblical guidelines" induce you to do so, an example of the "absolute standards of biblical morality."

Editor's Response to Letter #784

When your pastor refused to engage in debate and intellectual interplay with respect to the Bible, JB, you should have reminded him that he does not have that option according to his own book. Scripture clearly requires dialogue according to 1 Thess. 5:21 ("Prove all things"), 2 Tim. 4:2 ("convince, rebuke, and exhort, be unfailing in patience and in teaching"), Jude 3 ("ye should earnestly contend for the faith"), James 3:17 ("But the wisdom from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, open to reason"), and, of course, 1 Peter 3:15 ("Always be prepared to make a defense to any one who calls you to account for the hope that is in you"). If your former pastor would rather amble off into the sunset than debate, he is not only disobeying scripture but behaving hypocritically by failing to practice what he preaches; namely, follow the Bible.

Letter #785 from AS of Riverside, California

Dear Mr. McKinsey.I have been using your "Encyclopedia" for the past several months in my frequent on-line debates with Xians on the "Christianity On-line Message Boards" on AOL. It's been a real "godsend" -- a wonderful quick source for confounding fundies and a great source of general education for the rest of us. One forthright apologist, who came into the area sure he'd convert all us heathen, was so discombobulated by my series of mathematical blunders, unfulfilled promises, and such, that he won't respond to my posts anymore. I guess that's progress of a sort. Speaking of the Encyclopedia -- I have noticed a couple of minor errors that you may want to correct in future editions. In most of these few cases you've, in my judgment, allowed the inerrantists to get away with errors that they shouldn't be granted. There is more errancy than you note! For example:

Pg. 214, 5th line -- A camel is an artiodactyl and DOES have a cloven hoof (2 toes per foot with enlarged horny nails -- just like sheep, goats, cattle, etc.), contrary to the Biblical claim. Why even simple folk from the Mid-East couldn't have gotten that one right I don't know. This is evidence not only that the Bible isn't the word of god but that, in this matter, it's not even the product of well informed men.

Hares have multiple toes (5 front, 4 rear), and the soles of their feet are furred and lack the enlarged horny nails typical of animals said to have hooves. Your statement that, "The appropriate term for a hare's foot is not hoof" is an understatement. They don't have hooves in any sense of the word (of course, this is only a Biblical contradiction of observed reality -- we know that fundies are not impressed by those).

Hares/rabbits do NOT "chew the cud" in the same sense as cattle and goats. It's true that they do sometimes re-ingest their own feces and process them again to maximize nutrient extraction from the semi-digestible materials they consume, but that is a very different process from standard cud chewing (even if the results are similar).

I don't know whether conies (rock hyraxes) chew the cud -- but I'll bet they don't. That should be checked into (maybe I'll do it if I get some time). In any event, they also do not have hooves comparable to those of the horses and cattle. They do have enlarged "hoof like structures on most of the toes," but the soles of their feet have moist naked suction pads for climbing (R. T. Orr, Vertebrate Biology, pg. 242-243). They don't have true hooves, but they do have enlarged nails on their several (5?) toes.

Pg. 215, line 13 -- mustard plants are NEVER shrubs--they're merely herbs (non-woody plants), and mostly annual ones at that. The Bible is totally wrong on this -- not only does mustard never make a tree, as you rightly noted, but it never even makes a shrub either. A shrub is defined as a woody plant with multiple stems from the base. The distinction between trees and shrubs is not always clear and some species can be one or the other depending on conditions; so I'd not make the assertion that "shrubs do not grow into trees" (which is irrelevant in this case anyway).

Pg. 226 -- line 22 -- the text says "Noah," where you meant "Adam." Your general point is well taken, however, as illustrated by the fact that thousands of scientists working for the past 200 years have not yet managed to name even 50% of the species of animals. The idea that Adam could have accomplished this in a single lifetime, even a very long "biblical" one is preposterous. Especially if he also had to write the names down, with descriptions, so the names could be matched with the animals in the future. He would have had to do that -- otherwise, what's the point of the whole exercise? Name 'em and forget 'em? Thanks for all your efforts at promoting reason in this daffy land.

Editor's Response to Letter #785

Dear AS. Although we had already been apprised of the 'Noah' in place of 'Adam' error on page 226, your corrections are most appreciated and have been duly noted in our list of future revisions. We would encourage everyone to forward any additional mistakes they may have noticed. It is more important that the book be accurate than my ego and those of three proof-readers be shielded.

Letter #786 from DH of Lebanon, Oregon

Dear Dennis. The series of exchanges between JB and his pastor spread over the past few issues have constituted some of the most powerful material I've read in BE. Thanks for sharing it with all of us. I'd like to encourage JB to revise his narrative into an autobiographical pamphlet so it could be shared with an even wider audience. If he does, let us know! The pamphlet could either be in printed form or, even better, as a file(s) on the Internet where we could read and download to pass along to others.

Coincidentally, with my mail yesterday along with BE #185 came a copy of Dan Barker's "Losing Faith in Faith," a book I'd ordered from Freedom From Religion Foundation. I'm already well into that fascinating autobiographical account of a former fundamentalist preacher who rejected Christianity due to intellectual reasons, coming to the same conclusions as did JB. Retelling personal stories of how we came to achieve a status of disbelief can be highly interesting as well as instructive (and it is my opinion that some people will respond much more easily to the facts presented within a personal story than they will by reading the facts alone, a fact "discovered" by the conservative-oriented magazine Reader's Digest many decades ago). Many of us have gone through those transitions and reading about others' struggles and outcomes can be helpful. Other books I recommend along this line are Edward T. Babinski's "Leaving the Fold: Testimonies of Former Fundamentalists" (Prometheus, 1995) and "Jesus Doesn't Live Here Anymore: From Fundamentalist to Freedom Writer" by Skipp Porteous (Prometheus, 1991). Also excellent is a dual volume set by Austin Miles, "Don't Call Me Brother" (Prometheus, 1989) and "Setting The Captives Free" (Prometheus, 1990), to be read in that order.... Keep up the good work.

Letter #787 from JD of Port Townsend, Washington

Dear Dennis. I've been an admirer of you and your work for years. Like many, I was raised a fundamentalist Christian, saw the light, got out of fundamentalism and have been outspoken ever since. For a short while in Seattle I was president of a Freedom From Religion Foundation chapter, the head office based in Madison, Wisconsin.... My approach at debate has been influenced by you. I go after the Bible. I've found your work most useful because I get a lot of bang for the buck. In other words, not an excess of commentary or dialog to wade through. I'm most appreciative of your scholarship and dedicated, thoughtful approach.

Issue #189 September 1998, Editor: Dennis McKinsey

COMMENTARY

This month's issue will be devoted entirely to correspondence from our readers and begin with another poignant letter from JB, who gained some valuable information and thoughtful insights as a result of teaching Sunday School in a fundamentalist setting for more than 23 years.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #788 from JB Via E-mail (Part a)

TOUGH QUESTIONS FOR THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH

Through years of participation in the life and culture of evangelical Christianity, a number of "difficult to understand" issues came to my attention. The approach to these problems endorsed by evangelical Christian leaders is for thoughtful Christians to accept the "difficulties" as inscrutable but nevertheless true, and to endeavor to strengthen one's faith in other areas where "difficulties" are not a hindrance. I acquiesced to this approach while I lived my busy life, until such time as I should be able to search out the solid answers that evangelical theologians had undoubtedly derived from their more thorough and sophisticated study of scripture. After years of studying the Bible as an individual and in groups, listening to sermons, attending Christian conferences, leading a small group Bible study, reading evangelicalism's best apologists, and even preaching from the pulpit once, I was dismayed to discover that the church cannot answer the tough questions about Christianity. I was heartbroken when I finally recognized, quite contrary to my own wish, that the cumulative force of the so-called "difficulties" thoroughly and unquestionably discredits Christianity. Anticipating that many Christians will not accept my conclusion, and that they will urge me to come back to church and continue "searching, because of Jesus's promise that those who search will find, I have listed some questions the church must answer if it hopes to regain my attention. The questions that follow have been organized loosely into categories to aid in referencing them and many could legitimately be placed in other categories. Their current placement reflects my own judgment of where the weight of the questions carries the most force. The list is not exhaustive and is a sampling from a variety of sources. There are innumerable serious issues with Christianity already laid out in the existing body of skeptical literature. Several were independently discovered by myself before I learned of the existence of serious skeptical literature, a few are original with myself, and a few actually come from Christian sources. Some biblical references are given, but not all. I am assuming that any Christian knowledgeable enough to address these questions intelligently will not have trouble finding the relevant biblical passages. In addition, some questions assume a general familiarity with certain biblical and extra-biblical subjects which are not practical to reference because the relevant knowledge is widely dispersed through a large body of literature. For unreferenced items, a Christian who does not understand the issue probably is not well-read enough to attempt an answer.

Biblical Inconsistencies

1. Why does the evangelical church say there are no contradictions in the Bible when they are plainly there for anyone to see? (They are too numerous even to list a representative sample here. There are many books and monographs on this topic in the skeptical literature.1)
2. Why does the Old Testament teach that there is no hell, while the New Testament teaches that there is? The idea of "progressive Revelation" does not explain the conflicts in the biblical texts.
3. Why does most of the Old Testament teach that there is no afterlife (see Ecclesiastes 9:5-6, for example), while later Old Testament writings and the New Testament do?
4. Why does the church say that God is not the author of confusion (1 Corinthians 14:33), when many biblical passages flatly contradict this?2
5. Was God known by the name Yahweh prior to Moses (Exodus 6:3), or was he not (Genesis 4:26, 5:29, 9:24, 22:14, 27:20, 27:27, 28:20-21)?
6. Which "Ten Commandments" are the Ten Commandments - the ones listed at Exodus 20 and Deuteronomy 5, or the ones listed at Exodus 34? Only the list at Exodus 34 is explicitly called the "Ten Commandments" in the biblical text.
7. Was the Law given by Yahweh perfect (Psalm 19:7), or wasn't it (Hebrews 8:6-8)?

8. Why can't the six accounts of the resurrection be reconciled?3 Paul says that without the resurrection, the Christian faith is in vain (1 Cor 15:14). How could the biblical accounts possibly disagree on such an important narrative?

9. Why were the disciples surprised by Jesus's resurrection after Jesus had told them repeatedly to expect it?4 An angel even reminded the women that Jesus had told them of his impending resurrection (Luke 24:6-7). How is it that the women remembered his words (Luke 24:8), but the disciples didn't (John 20:9, Luke 24:12)? Even Jesus's enemies remembered that he had foretold that he would rise again (Matthew 27:63).

Biblical Ambiguities and Omissions

1. Why is the Bible unclear about how to be saved? Is there anything more important that the Bible could communicate? Why is it ambiguous and contradictory on this subject?

2. Why does Jesus teach salvation by works in the synoptic gospels, but John portrays him teaching salvation by faith?

3. Why does John not teach in his gospel that it is necessary to repent of our sins, since he states that his gospel was written specifically for the purpose of showing people how to be saved (John 20:31)?

4. Why is the nature and practice of the two sacraments - baptism and the Lord's Supper - left ambiguous in the Bible and a cause of discord among churches?

5. Why is the book of Revelation incomprehensible if it is really "not sealed" (Rev 22:10)? Why are the prophecies in the book of Daniel actually easier to understand, if they are sealed (Daniel 12:9)?

6. Why doesn't the Bible provide unambiguous answers for major divisive doctrines like efficacy of baptism, paedobaptism, mode of adult baptism, soteriology, Christology, trinitarianism, satanology, angelology, nature of the afterlife, eschatology, fundamentals of the faith, the standing of Jewish believers in relation to the Law, the standing of Gentile believers in relation to the Law?

Misinterpretation of Scripture by New Testament Figures

1. Why did the writers of the New Testament feel free to misquote and misinterpret the Old Testament and conflate verses?5

2. Why did the gospel writers use the Septuagint, an inferior translation of the Old Testament?6 Did the Holy Spirit fail to inspire them with the more accurate Hebrew text, the one accepted today?

3. Why did Matthew and Peter take Old Testament passages out of context to make them into prophecies, when they were never indicated to be prophetic by the Old Testament author (Acts 1:20 versus Psalm 69:25, for example)?

4. Why did Mark misreference an Old Testament prophet (Mark 1:2)?⁷ How can we rely on Mark to explain Old Testament prophecies to us if he is even mistaken about the source?
5. Why does Jude quote the non-canonical Book of Enoch as prophecy (Jude 14-15)? Did the Holy Spirit fail to inspire Jude with the fact that the Book of Enoch would not be accepted into the canon?
6. Why does Matthew quote a non-existent Old Testament prophecy (Matthew 2:23)? Was he using noncanonical writings, too?
7. Why does Matthew attribute a quote about the potter's field to Jeremiah, when Jeremiah has no such passage, and the closest one in the Old Testament is Zechariah (Matt 27:9-10; Zechariah 11:12)?
8. Why doesn't Paul ever quote Jesus from the gospel accounts, or show that he knew anything about Jesus's teachings and life as portrayed in the gospels?
9. Why is no single hermeneutic adequate for interpretation of scripture" Why were the New Testament authors so free and loose in their hermeneutics (the science of interpretation; esp., the study of the principles of biblical exegesis)? How could the meanings of some words and phrases have been lost? How could some cultural references have been lost? How can many books and passages admit of multiple interpretations. Doesn't God want us to understand his Word enough to protect the knowledge of its referents and use unambiguous diction and phraseology

Failed Biblical Promises

1. Why doesn't prayer work, when the Bible promises that it will (John 14:14, for example)?
- 2 Why aren't Christians doing greater works than Jesus did, since he himself said they would (John 14:12)? The context is clearly referring to miracles.

Failed Prophecies

1. Why have no prophecies been demonstrated to have been fulfilled? Why are many Old Testament prophecies too vague to be tested? Why are many Old Testament prophecies "yet to be" fulfilled? Why has it been impossible to demonstrate that the Old Testament prophecies were written prior to the events forecasted?
2. Why wasn't Tyre destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar as prophesied by Ezekiel (Ezekiel 26)? When it was destroyed by Alexander the Great, why didn't it remain desolate as prophesied by Ezekiel?⁸

3. How can it be that Isaiah prophesied a temporary destruction of Tyre, while Ezekiel prophesied a permanent destruction (Ezekiel 26:14,21; 27:36; 28:19 versus Isaiah 23:13-18)?
4. Why wasn't there a 40-year period in Egypt's history when the whole land was devoid of people and animals, as prophesied by Ezekiel (Ezekiel 29:11-12)?
5. Why is so much of New Testament prophecy incomprehensible? Why produce a prophecy at all, if it cannot be understood?

Problems with Miracles

1. Why haven't any of the miracles recorded in the Bible been independently confirmed?
2. Why don't verifiable miracles happen today? What better way is there to convince people of the Christian message, and isn't that the commission given to the church by Jesus?
3. Why don't evangelical Christians accept miracle stories recorded in ancient non-biblical works? Isn't it the case that evangelical Christians have decided a priori to accept biblical miracles and reject all others? Aren't the apologists' "objective standards" for accepting or rejecting extra-biblical miracles post hoc?

Origin and Transmission of the Scriptures

1. Why is the authorship of most books of the Bible disputed? Why do many books of the Bible have no statement of authorship? Why are some books in the canon pseudepigraphical (lie about authorship)?
2. Why did the early church not revere the scriptures as Christians do today, so that they added interpolations and made emendations?
3. Why hasn't the Bible been transmitted to us in perfect condition if it is so important and if God had his supernatural hand in it? Why did both Israel and the church add interpolations, emend, and conflate the texts?

The Canon

1. Why is the Mosaic injunction against false prophets ignored in the canon? Deuteronomy 18:20-22 should disqualify Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Jonah, Jesus, and Paul.
2. Why is the canon disputed by the church? Is God content to let uninspired writings falsely be proclaimed as his Word? Furthermore, how do we know the canon is complete?

3. Why has no one been able to describe a consistent objective basis for establishing the canon? Why was the canon established by vote instead of on objective principles? Why was the canon not directly revealed by God?

4. Why is so much of New Testament doctrine revealed through the use of occasional letters instead of in systematic books written, authorized, and canonized specifically to define Christian doctrine? Why didn't God deliver these himself, as he did the Law to Moses? Maybe this explains why the Old Testament Law has more clarity than the New Testament doctrines. Why did God leave the writing of systematic theologies to modern, uninspired writers, who cannot agree with one another?

Biblical Values

1. When Adam and Eve ate the forbidden fruit, why did God lie about what the outcome would be (Genesis 2:17),⁹ while the serpent told the truth (Genesis 3:5, 22)?

2. Why are women treated as chattel and inferior to men throughout the Bible?¹⁰

3. Why is the Old Testament and most of the New Testament addressed only to free men, and not to women or slaves? Does God deal only with free males?¹¹

4. Why does the Bible condone slavery?¹²

5. Why does Yahweh command genocide,¹³ including the killing of infants? Why does he command that all women who have "known a man" be slaughtered, but the soldiers are to keep the young virgins for their own use (Numbers 31:14-18)? Why does the Bible portray Yahweh as worse than Hitler (Deuteronomy 20:16-17)? Isn't it blasphemous to call the Bible "God's Word," when it libels him so?

6. Why doesn't the Bible condemn polygamy? Is it not really a sin? In fact, the Bible seems to condone polygamy through examples of God blessing polygamists and by its explicit statements regarding David.

7. Why wasn't Lot condemned for giving his daughters to be abused by the men of Sodom (Genesis 19:8)?

The Bible actually calls him righteous (2 Peter 2:7)!

8. How can Christians say that the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of religion is based on Judeo-Christian ethics when Deuteronomy 13:6-10 and 17:2-7 flatly contradict this?

9. How can being mauled by a bear possibly be a just punishment for name-calling (2 Kings 2:23-24)? Doesn't this contradict God's own edict of "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth?"

10. Why is faith - believing something for which there is no evidence - a virtue?

11. Why is rational skepticism a vice? If Christianity is true, won't the truth hold up under scrutiny? Shouldn't the church welcome and promote rational skepticism as a way of confirming and spreading the faith when people see that it fails to undermine Christianity? Why isn't skeptical literature studied and refuted in Sunday School classes?

Biblical Guidance

1. Why do Moses, Ezra, Jesus, and Paul all disagree on marriage and divorce? Moses allowed divorce, Jesus disallowed it and also allowed it, Paul allowed it, and Ezra actually commanded it to appease God (Ezra 10). How is an honest Christian supposed to know what to do in this area?

2. Why does the New Testament teach by example that major decisions should be decided by lot (in Acts chapter 1 when Matthias is chosen, for example)?

3. Why doesn't the Bible provide unambiguous guidance for major divisive issues like abortion, divorce, war, church discipline, lending and borrowing money, etc.? Doesn't God want the church to be uni-ted? Doesn't God want individual Christians to know how they should live?

Conflicts with Science

1. Why does the Bible teach that the sky is a solid dome of transparent material with water above it? (The water poured through the "windows of heaven" to cause Noah's flood, and then presumably poured off the edge of the disk-shaped earth into the abyss.)

2. Why does the Bible teach that goats will have striped offspring if they see stripes when they drink at the watering trough, when this has been discredited by modern genetics?

3. Why does the Bible record scientifically impossible events as factual? For example, the creation narrative, Noah's deluge, a solid dome over the sky, Earth supported by a foundation. Why has the evangelical church produced "Creation Science" explanations that are complete nonsense? Why is it that none of the more rational reconciliations of science and the Bible survives scrutiny?

4. How can it be that Psalm 16 and Romans 1 teach that the creation is a reliable means of knowing God ("natural theology"), but the scientific study of biological and geological origins contradicts the creation narrative in Genesis? Why does "natural theology" contradict "revealed theology" (the Bible)? Is the creation bearing false witness? Is the Bible bearing false witness?

Absurd Doctrines

1. Where is the justice in punishing us for Adam's sin? The Bible itself says that children will not be punished for the parents' sins (Deuteronomy 24:16). Furthermore, if God really created Adam not knowing either good or evil (Genesis 3:22), how could such a harsh and enduring punishment as death for Adam and all his descendants possibly be just? Our secular courts are more just than God when they show mercy on people who cannot distinguish between right and wrong, such as children and the mentally handicapped. And why isn't this doctrine of original sin found anywhere in the Bible except in Paul's writings?

2. Where is the justice in punishing Jesus for our sins? If our courts of law were to accept the punishment of someone else in the place of the criminal, we would not say that justice has been done, but that injustice has been added to injustice. Would the church have me believe that two wrongs make a right?

3. How can sacrificing Jesus on behalf of the sinner atone for another's sin? This would be like killing my child to reconcile for the misbehavior of my neighbor's child. I have the capacity simply to forgive and forget without demanding compensation for small offenses. Why can't God do this? Does he simply want blood?

4. Why pray? If it changes God's mind then he is not sovereign. If it does not change God's mind then it is superfluous.

5. How can the doctrine of the Trinity possibly be true? Any attempt to make sense of it leads to contradictions. If it is so important, why isn't it clearly taught in the Bible? Why shouldn't an objective student of the doctrine conclude that it was created by the church to hide behind a shroud of mystery biblical inconsistencies about the nature of Christ?

6. Why is God concerned about humans at all? We are less than a speck in the universe. Christianity has the hallmarks of being a religion made by humans for humans.

7. Why have all the rational arguments for the existence of God been successfully refuted? If God exists, is it unreasonable to suppose that there would be at least one irrefutable proof of his existence?

8. Why haven't the existing proofs of God's non-existence been refuted? Surely believers, who have the advantage of an indwelling Holy Spirit with an "infinite mind," cannot be stumped by "finite minds" of unbelievers working within the confining limitations of reason, can they?

9. Why is it that some teachings are conveniently tautological (i.e., circular)? For example, you must pray the will of God in order for prayer to be answered; you must believe the Bible in order to understand the Bible; and the Bible is the Word of God, therefore it is true.

10. How exactly does "loving God and enjoying him forever" give meaning to life? Any satisfying secular activity can give meaning to life. Why does the Christian assume that a metaphysical meaning for life is necessary? Isn't it the Christian who imposes meaninglessness on this present life, declaring that meaning depends for its existence on the life to come? And if Christians did not believe they will live forever, would they continue to love and serve God? Isn't it really eternal life that the Christian loves, and not God?

11. Where is objective, verifiable evidence that a soul or spirit exists and survives the body after death? Why does the Old Testament deny such an idea until the later writings, which show the influence of Greek ideas? The idea of "progressive Revelation" does not explain this.

7 This misreference is found in the critical text, but not in the Textus Receptus, illustrating that the early church was willing to emend the holy scriptures to remove difficulties.

8 Ezekiel 26:14, 27:36, 28:19; Wallace B. Fleming, The History of Tyre, Columbia University Press, 1915, p. 64.

9 Some modern translations soften Yahweh's statement that Adam would die "in that day," and so disguise the problem.

10 The evidence is too overwhelming to cite even a representative portion of the relevant scriptures, but a few of the more explicit examples are Deuteronomy 21:10-14, 24:1-4; Leviticus 12:2,5; 1 Corinthians 11:3,9; Ephesians 5:22-24; 1 Timothy 2:12-14. A good source of additional information on this topic is the Freedom From Religion Foundation, PO Box 750, Madison, Wisconsin 53701.

11 The fact that God dealt with Israel during their slavery does not weaken the force of this question. Israel's slavery was a temporary condition designed to underline Israel's dependence on Yahweh. Yahweh began to deal with Israel when he was a free man.

(TO BE CONCLUDED NEXT MONTH)

Letter #789 from TO of Joliet, Illinois

... (After an extended paragraph denouncing biblicists for failing to acknowledge the Bible's inadequacies TO says--Ed.),

You quoted John 7:8-10 RSV as a contradiction in a sample issue you sent me awhile back. Yes, the RSV does say "...not going..." but the NIV says "...not yet going to this feast..." The NIV seems to have fixed the contradiction. I'm sure that you don't have space to quote every bible version and explain their choice of text and translation in all of your arguments. But how would you have us deal with this situation? In my studies into textual criticism and biblical languages I became aware of certain dishonest and deceptive uses of certain texts and translations by the people putting out these translations. I tend to believe that they are aware that they are "not" putting these bibles together using unbiased critical scholarship. These scholars are not beyond using late texts and questionable translations to throw the light off of biblical errors. My question is how do we deal with this problem when debating Christians? Your insight on this subject is much needed.

Editor's Response to Letter #789

Dear TO. The alteration of John 7:8-10 by some translators is one of the classic cases of apologetic expediency in action. The problem is quite simple. Jesus said he was not going to a feast but he later went secretly. In other words, he lied. In order to elude this dilemma many apologists have concluded that the most viable approach is to rewrite the script. When Jesus says in verse 8, "Go to the feast yourselves; I am not going up to this feast" some have chosen to insert the word "yet" into the text. It would then say, "I am not going up yet to this feast" which clearly implies he would be going later and, in fact, that's what happened.

How do you deal with a problem of this nature? Well, first you make sure everyone is aware of the textual conflicts between the various versions on the market. Versions such as the RSV, the JB, the ASV, the NEB, the NAB, the TEV, and the NASB are candid enough to admit the word "yet" has no business in the script; they don't have it. While those who created the the KJ, the ML, the NIV, the NWT and the LV opted for expediency.

And second, you require those who feel the word "yet" has been properly inserted to prove their arguments while disproving biblicists who disagree. It is their problem; so ask them to reconcile the conflict. The burden of proof is on their shoulders. I would recommend that you obtain issues 66 through 70 which cover issues like this in general and this problem in particular under the heading VERSIONS DIFFER.

Letter #790 from AG of Bradenton, Florida

Dear Dennis. I am new to reading Biblical Errancy but it couldn't have come at a better time. I work for a devout born-again Christian, and am surrounded by the same kind of people as well as a few Mennonites and an Episcopalian, and I am constantly under attack for my beliefs. I am by origin catholic but also went through the born-again stage with the Assembly of God for 2 years. Since then I am back to being a catholic but with many different beliefs. Anyway I have spent many hours reading back issues of Biblical Errancy and none of the hours have been wasted. I am grateful for people like you who shorten our study time by showing fallacies only much research could uncover. I am one of the few believers in God who has read the bible from beginning to end, but I was totally amazed at how many errors I easily overlooked. I appreciate the ammunition you have given me, and the last few days at work I have shut-up the hypocrites. I was able to show them that their inspired scriptures are full of bla-tant errors to which none could give any answer except "I don't know" & "you tell me." Isn't it funny that the one who brings up the question can be discounted, since he doesn't have the answer. Anyway I got the ole "you just haven't felt the power and glory of Jesus" at the end of our discussion, which is the Christian's last desperate attempt to validate his false teachings. We usually have moral discussions but the last few days have been a burning of believers. It's amazing how brainwashed good people can get and then totally deny the obvious for fear of the unknown. Anyway I am sending my annual subscription this week and hope to get a few back issues as well. It will make good bathroom reading material in our office and hopefully open a few minds. Keep up the good work. Maybe you're our savior from the evil of stupidity and closed- mindedness.

Editor's Response to Letter #790

Dear AG. I am glad to see you are slowly but surely making it up and out of the quagmire and using BE in the manner intended. Just send me your address and I will send you a free list of all the materials we have available.

Letter #791 from JDG of Buenos Aires, Argentina

Keep up the good work! Your point-of-view is very clear and stimulating. The chapter entitled "The Philosophy of Biblical Errancy" in your book is a must. I agree with you that "As long as people believe the Bible is God's word, conflicts will continue unabated.

Letter #792 from SS of Angels Camp, California

My regrets that the paper issue of BE is drawing to a close. You are to be commended for doing a fine job and bringing enlightenment to many more than you know.... I do not know when my subscription expires but, as you say, keep the change. If not, let me know and I will stay till the very end and then pick you up via the internet. Thanks again for a job well done.

Issue #190 October 1998, Editor: Dennis McKinsey

COMMENTARY

This month's issue will be devoted entirely to correspondence from our readers and begin by concluding the poignant letter from JB, that was discussed in the prior issue. As a result of having taught Sunday school for 23 years, JB has a series of well-considered questions that contributed mightily to his disillusionment with Christianity in general and the Bible in particular.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #788 from JB Via Email Concludes (Part b)

TOUGH QUESTIONS FOR THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH (CONCLUDES)

Intractable Theological Problems

1. How could Adam and Eve have ever sinned if God had actually created them perfect, even if they did have free will? If God created them imperfect, how could a perfect omnipotent being create anything imperfect.

2. How can evil exist in the world if God is simultaneously good, omnipotent, and loving? Why is it that no theodicy stands up under rational scrutiny?
3. Why does the church say God did not create evil, when he himself claims that he did in Isaiah 45:7, Lamentations 3:38, and Amos 3:6?15
4. Why does God expressly take credit for creating disabilities (Exodus 4:11)? If these are God's doing, then why does the evangelical church insist that disabilities are the result of the fall, or of Satan's work?
5. Why would a loving, omnipotent, benevolent god cause people to believe falsehoods so that he can condemn them (2 Thessalonians 2:11-12)?
6. Why is the Bible inconsistent on major theological issues such as the nature and existence of an afterlife, the efficacy of works of the Law with regard to salvation, and the distinction between soul and spirit?
7. Why does the evangelical church speak of absolute values when the Bible teaches situational ethics?16
8. Why is it not possible to formulate a systematic theology that agrees with the Bible on all points? Roman Catholic theology introduces unbiblical and irrational ideas; Calvinistic reformed theology stumbles at the existence of evil; covenantal theology muddles the biblical distinctions between Israel and the church; dispensational theology is too hopelessly complex to be credible because every major inconsistency is explained away by spuriously introducing a new "dispensation;" and Arminianism destroys the sovereignty of God.
9. Why doesn't the Bible itself present its own "revealed" systematic theology. Doesn't God want us to have a consistent and complete framework of theology to support right decision-making and teaching others?

Blemishes on the Church

1. Why does the church worship on Sunday, when the seventh day was established forever? There is no biblical support for Sunday worship; it is a tradition of the Catholic Church accepted by Protestants.
2. Why do many evangelical churches deny that baptism is essential for salvation, when the New Testament clearly teaches that it is essential?17
3. Why do some churches object to wine, since the Bible indicates that it is a gift from God (Psalm 104:14-15)?18 How can they continue to object, even when they acknowledge that Jesus turned water into wine? Is this anything more than a holdover from prohibition? In fact, the Bible promotes drunkenness in Proverbs 31:6-7.
4. Why does the modern evangelical church embrace the extra-biblical doctrines of "having a personal relationship with Christ," having a "quiet time," "journaling," and the necessity of belonging to an "accountability group?" Doesn't the church understand its own religion? Why is it caught up in pop-religion? If these are not really doctrines of the church, then why is there social pressure to conform?

5. Why does the church teach tithing for Christians, when it is only commanded of Old Testament Israel? Why didn't Paul teach tithing to the New Testament church when he had the opportunity (2 Corinthians 9)?

6. Why do some churches ignore controversial teachings in the Bible, such as speaking in tongues, baptism for the dead, the requirement for women to wear head coverings and to remain silent, the identification of the "sons of God" in Genesis 6, the necessity of poverty in order to follow Jesus (Luke 14:33), etc? Doesn't the Holy Spirit reveal the true meaning of these passages to believers? If so, why do sincere believers come to opposite conclusions on their own, and why aren't they able to come to agreement when they dialog with each other? Surely Jesus is with them to guide them when two or three are gathered together in his name, isn't he, even if they misapprehended the Spirit's guidance when they were on their own?

7. Why must Christians resort to divination (looking for "guidance," looking for "doors of circumstance to open or close," etc.) if the Holy Spirit dwells within them? What is the benefit of an indwelling Holy Spirit if it doesn't manifest itself in day-to-day living and it has to be coaxed into revealing God's will in major decisions?

8. Why do Christians pray about whether to marry someone, when Paul says that if they want to get married, they should just do it (1 Corinthians 7)?

9. Why does the evangelical church rail against one-world government, since its members say it is in God's plan as revealed in Revelation? How can they justify speaking and acting against God's revealed plan?

The Headless Church

1. Why is the evangelical church subject to the same social movements as the rest of society? If the church is headed by the living Christ, shouldn't the institution be a steady keel in a stormy sea?

2. Why does the church trail rather than lead in social reforms? (For example: the rise of capitalism, rise of the scientific method and critical thinking, abolition of slavery, eradication of Nazism, women's suffrage, civil rights of African-Americans after the abolition of slavery.) And why does the church dishonestly claim leadership in these reforms after the fact?

3. Why are the church's day-to-day practices guided by cultural norms rather than by the perfect, absolute, unchangeable norms of God and the Bible? For example, why do churches separate children from their families and age-grade them like the schools, why does the church propagate self-help ideology when the message of the Bible is dependence upon God, why does the church accept and participate in competition where it has rejected it in the past,19 why has the service of women in the church been addressed only after secular culture has addressed women's issues, why does the style of music in the church and church architecture follow cultural patterns instead of defining cultural patterns?

4. Why doesn't the church understand Jesus's teachings? Why are most preachers afraid to preach straight through a gospel from beginning to end? Why do they skip over Jesus's "difficult" sayings and the enigmatic passages?

Character of the Church

1. Why has the church done so little good and so much harm in 2000 years, while science has demonstrated remarkable progress in only 500 years? Why is the period when the church dominated western history universally referred to as the Dark Ages, while the period of breaking away from church dogma is called the Enlightenment?

2. Why are the Crusades and the Inquisition and other church-sponsored atrocities politely ignored in many church education programs, leaving church members to learn of these in other venues, or, more likely, to remain ignorant of the heritage of the institution to which they belong and contribute.

3. Why does the church conceal and ignore and misrepresent legitimate criticisms and critics? If Christianity is undoubtedly true, why doesn't the church demonstrate it by refuting the whole body of skeptical literature in Sunday School classes? The church isn't trying to hide something is it? How can the church possibly maintain credibility when it is so blatantly partisan on the side of dogma, and obviously not dispassionately seeking truth wherever the evidence may lead.

4. Why do so many members of the church dismiss the veracity of unbelief without even giving it a fair hearing, especially in light of biblical condemnations of this behavior, such as "He who answers before listening - that is his folly and his shame" (Proverbs 18:13, NIV), and "The first to present his case seems right, till another comes forward and questions him" (Proverbs 18:17, NIV), for example.

Problems with the Credentials and Character of Jesus

1. Why are many Old Testament prophecies about Jesus referenced in the New Testament taken out of context, not being messianic prophecies at all?20 Why would Jesus's disciples, and Jesus himself in Matthew 4:13-16, misrepresent the Old Testament text? Surely the Son of God would not allow a disciple to persist in a distorted understanding of the scriptures, nor teach in a synagogue class an unjustified misinterpretation of scripture?

2. Why doesn't Jesus fit the real, clearly identifiable, messianic prophecies of the Old Testament? Why do the gospel writers ignore these prophecies? Why does the church condemn first century Jews for rejecting Jesus as the Messiah, when he clearly does not fulfill the Old Testament prophecies of the Messiah? Why must we wait until Jesus' second coming to see the clearest prophecies fulfilled?

3. Why do the two genealogies of Jesus in Matthew and Luke disagree? If someone is declared to be the son of God, surely his credentials must be impeccable, mustn't they? Two variant genealogies cast suspicion on the true origin of this man, don't they?

4. Why does the genealogy in Matthew 1 show that Jesus descended through a cursed line?²¹ Jeconiah (Jehoiachin) and his father Jehoiakim were both cursed by God himself, who said that neither of these men would have any descendent on the throne of David. How could Jesus possibly be the Messiah, destined to rule forever on the throne of David, if he descended through either of these men?

5. If the genealogy in Luke is that of Mary and not Joseph, then why does it list Joseph in the line rather than Mary? Why is no other genealogy of a woman recorded anywhere else in scripture? And if this is Mary's genealogy, then Jesus descended through Nathan, not Solomon, making the prophecies in 2 Samuel 7:12-16 and 1 Chronicles 22:10 false.

6. If, using the genealogy in Luke, Jesus's claim to descent from David, of the tribe of Judah, is through Mary rather than Joseph, then how can it be that Mary's cousin, Elizabeth, was descended from the house of Aaron, of the tribe of Levi (Luke 1:5)?

7. Why does Jesus misquote the Old Testament?²²

8. Why does Jesus refer to the writings of Moses (Mark 12:26), when it is clear that Moses could not possibly have written the Pentateuch?²³ Surely the son of God would know more about the Word of God than anyone else, wouldn't he?

9. How can it be that Jesus contradicts the Old Testament (1 Samuel 21:1-2), saying that Abiathar gave David the showbread instead of Ahimelech, and saying that David had men with him, when he was actually alone (Mark 2:25-26)? Does the church expect me to rely upon the teachings of a "son of God" who is demonstrably mistaken about what God's Word says?

10. Why does Jesus quote a non-existent verse of Old Testament scripture (John 7:38)? Is it possible that he considered other non-canonical writings also to be God's Word?

11. Why would Jesus deliberately obscure the gospel by speaking in parables so that people would not understand, turn, and be forgiven (Mark 4:11-12)? Did he not come that all men might be saved?

12. Why was Jesus in the tomb for only two and a half days at the most, when he said he would be there three days and three nights (Matthew 12:40)? Surely the son of God would say precisely what he means, wouldn't he?

13. Why would Jesus prophesy that his kingdom would come in glory before some of those listening to him died, but the kingdom still has not come (Matt 16:28, Matt 10:23, Mark 9:1, Luke 21:31-32)? Surely the son of God could not have spoken a false prophecy, could he?

14. Why did Jesus say his followers must hate their families? Surely, when the son of God said "hate" he meant "hate," didn't he? Why would the son of God confuse us by using hyperbole? How could the examples of Luke 9:59-62, even if allegorical, be hyperbole anyway? Jesus clearly called a man to the irresponsible, disrespectful action of leaving his father, implying that he was not even to attend his funeral, and he called another to leave his family without even saying farewell or letting them know he was deserting them.

15. Why was Jesus disrespectful of his mother?²⁴ In John 2:4, Jesus uses the same words with his mother that demons use when they meet Jesus.²⁵ Surely the son of God knew that Mary had the blessing of the Father, didn't he, (and she was the mother of God--Ed.) not to mention the fact that the son of God would never be rude?

16. Why did Jesus lie to his brothers about going to Jerusalem (John 7:8-10)?²⁶ Did God the Father send a lying spirit, as he did in 1 Kings? Like Father, like Son?

17. Why did Jesus, by his own admission, break the Sabbath law (John 5:16-18)?²⁷ This puts the lie to the Christian idea that the perfect Jesus fulfilled the whole Law, and therefore was a suitable unblemished sacrifice for our sins.

18. Why did Jesus say the ruler's daughter was not dead? (Matt 9:18-25; Luke 8:41-56) Either Jesus lied, or he performed no miracle, but the context clearly shows that it was understood to be a miracle.

Evolution of Religion by Naturalistic Social Processes

1. If Christian theology and the church have a supernatural origin in an omnipotent God, then why has theology and the church evolved through naturalistic social processes over time?

2. Why does theology change from the beginning of the the Bible to the end? Why are the later writings influenced by Greek thought (for example, immortality)? Why is there such a large theological gap between the Old and New Testaments? The changes are not explainable by the idea of "progressive Revelation," or by any systematic theology.

3. Why was the doctrine of the Trinity unknown to the church until the fourth century? Why was the doctrine established by vote instead of by Revelation? Why was the membership of the voting council loaded with Athanasians? Why was belief in this then-new doctrine made a condition for membership in the church? Why were Arians exiled and executed?

4. Why is Jesus so similar to the other 15 suffering saviors of mythology? Why don't Christians believe any of the other virgin births and savior stories recorded in ancient literature? How is it that the ritual of Christian communion existed in the prior pagan ceremonies of eating the body and drinking the blood of their gods? How is it that the Christian ritual of baptism also existed in the prior pagan cults? Weren't the very defining doctrines of Christianity actually assimilated from the endemic pagan cults? Likewise, why are Easter, Christmas, the Lenten season, Rogation days, and others, derived from pagan holidays. Didn't Christianity have any legitimate calendar of commemorations of its own?

5. How did liberal churches come to exist? If they are inclined to believe, why did they not continue to believe the "fundamentals?" Could it be because the fundamentals have insurmountable problems that discredit them?

Conclusion

1. Why hasn't the church answered any of these questions in the 23 years I have been a part of it?

2. Why hasn't the church answered any of these questions in 2000 years? I can only conclude that it is because the church has no answers.

End Notes

15 Despite the renderings in the modern translations, this is the same Hebrew word translated "evil" in numerous other passages. However, even with the modern renderings, how can the Christian explain God's taking credit for "calamity" (NASB) or "woe" (NRSV) or "disaster" (NIV)?

16 David's eating the showbread, for example, and Jesus's Golden Rule.

17 Mark 16:16; Acts 2:38, John 3:3, 3:5, 3:7, Acts 22:16; , Romans 6:3-6, Gal. 3:27, 1 Peter 3:21

18 See also, for example, Jeremiah 13:12, Joel 2:19, Deuteronomy 14:25-26, Isaiah 25:6, Deuteronomy 7:13.

19 The ancient Olympics were outlawed by the church through direct governmental influence, and the modern Olympics were not revived until the church lost its hold on secular government.

20 Matthew 3:3 versus Isaiah 40:3; Matthew 4:13-16 versus Isaiah 9:1-2; John 19:36 versus Psalm 34:20; John 19:37 versus Zechariah 12:10.

21 Matthew 1:11-12 + Jeremiah 22:28-30 and 1 Chronicles 3:16 + Jeremiah 36:30 versus Luke 1:32.

22 Matthew 4:10 versus Deuteronomy 6:13; Matthew 11:10 versus Malachi 3:1; Matthew 21:16 versus Psalm 8:2; Luke 4:17-21 versus Isaiah 61:1-2.

23 This is firmly established by Pentateuchal anachronisms detailed in numerous critical sources.

24 Matthew 12:46-50, Mark 3:31-35, Luke 8:19-21, John 2:4.

25 Compare John 2:4 with Matthew 8:29, Mark 5:7, Luke 4:34, and Luke 8:28 in literal translation

26 The "yet" inserted in some modern translations is not found in the earliest extant manuscripts. This is an example of modern emendation of holy scripture. The more honest translations, like the RSV, italicize "yet" in a footnote, indicating that the word has been added by some versions in translation. The New American Standard Bible does not insert the word, remaining true to the critical Greek text. But the New International Version inserts "yet" in normal typeset, relegating the explanation of its dubious character to a footnote, where many uncritical readers will miss it.

27 The point of this reference is that Jesus plainly said that he was working, in violation of the Sabbath law. If he was not really working, then he lied.

(The last issue will contain a final letter from JB that's quite heartening-Ed.)

Letter #793 from DM Via Email

Dear Dennis. A recent letter to the editor (DC of Minnesota) cited Luke 23:43 ("And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, Today shalt thou be with me in paradise.") and suggested that the comma had been misplaced by translators. I have encountered this argument from Jehovah Witnesses and at one time believed it myself. However, to believe that the comma has been misplaced is to suggest that not only have scores of translators been incompetent but that Jesus himself misused an expression that was unique to him and him alone. The "misplaced" comma defense is unique to those who hold the view that at death the soul "sleeps" and the body goes to the grave to await the resurrection. This defense becomes essential to those holding that position because if Jesus and the dying repentant thief were truly united in Paradise that same day then the "soul sleep" doctrine takes a serious blow. However, every single translation that I know of in the English language, but one, translates that passage with the comma before the word "today." The one translation that doesn't render the passage like the others is the New World Translation printed by the Watchtower Society. We have to wonder why. Furthermore, this expression "Verily I tell you..." was unique to Jesus. No one else used it in the entire New Testament. Jesus uses it over seventy times in the gospels.

Note that very carefully, over seventy times. In every single case Jesus always says, "Verily I tell you,...." then follows with a statement. (In John's gospel the evangelist adds an extra "Verily" to each of his sayings). Over seventy times...and yet we are expected to believe that on this one occasion Jesus changed an expression that was unique to him by saying, "Verily I tell you today,..." followed by a statement. A little reflection will show that surely the thief knew what day it was. It would have been unnecessary for Jesus to tell the thief what day he was speaking but it would have been significant to tell the thief that he would that very day be with Jesus in heavenly bliss. It would make no sense for Jesus to tell the thief what day he was speaking (as if the thief didn't already know) yet not tell him when he would be with him in Paradise.... The traditional, fundamental view of the placement of the Lucan comma is a sound one.

Editor's Response to Letter #793

Dear DM. Your analysis is good but I would make a significant modification. You say, "The 'misplaced' comma defense is unique to those...." I would say it is not unique but quite common to all those wanting to escape this contradiction any way they can.

Letter #794 from DH of Lebanon, Oregon

Dear Dennis. I experienced a broad spectrum of emotions while pondering BE #186. Your statement of Closure is complete and I find no fault with your desires to go on to other things which you feel might be more productive and enjoyable. I assume from what you've written in BE and in your Encyclopedia that much of what you have done, perhaps all of it, has been a voluntary effort for you rather than any means of making a living. You did it because you felt it had to be done (and I should quickly add that you did it, from my perspective, very well). I have worked all my life in the realm of nonprofits which exist primarily due to the dedicated effort of volunteers who believe in the "cause." I know from experience that there are very few people who are able or willing to step forward to a position of leadership and those who do assume leadership roles most often do so because they are confronted face-to-face with a situation where they cannot gracefully back out of a commitment! Call it human nature, habit, cultural conditioning, or whatever, people just don't as a rule stand up to the line and say "give me something to do." They won't accept the challenge and run with it unless they have to. So perhaps my observation would be that you were a bit too optimistic about your cause and its appeal to others. The fact that you have produced 189 issues of BE, the Encyclopedia, and the radio and TV tapes shows that there has been much interest and many of us have profited intellectually from what you have done.

I liked your response to letter #778; publication of your notebooks would be even another needed tool--I've often thought that a cross-referenced bible for us would be great; maybe the notebook idea is even better. You'll never know the overall effect of your work.

Unlike the bible thumpers, I cannot promise you a judgment day when the fruits of your labor will be revealed to you! I don't know what your circulation history has been, but perhaps the Internet will reach more people in the long run. The chief problem about volunteers for our "cause" is that we lack the will to organize. Christianity has its churches with a local presence that can motivate people to act. With few exceptions, those of us who are unchurched do not. Efforts to set up structures have often met with failure because, frankly, most of us grew up in a church and feel relieved to be free of those types of commitments on our time, energy and money. Debunking the bible requires great commitment on our part to study a book which we have already determined is flawed and not the glorious document it is touted to be. Few of us like the challenge of telling people that what they believe is bunk (Of course, as you often say, your approach is much different from this). For you, however, it was apparently something that appealed to you very much. And many of us have benefited from that. So don't for a minute consider your few active participants a sign of failure. I for one, a relatively new subscriber [2-3 years?] look forward to your new endeavors, although I will regret the loss of BE.... My friend, it is with sadness that I acknowledge the cessation of BE, but may you not drop out of sight after the pressure of deadlines eases off. I admire and have profited from your work and wish you well.

It has to be frustrating to have put such an effort into a project and not have much help from inactive supporters. I believe that your mission is not just to entertain or validate the anti-biblical readers but rather to make a change in a biblically-intoxicated society. Even so, I want you to know that you have made a world of difference in my life from the standpoint of gaining understanding relative to this modern day mythology. It is a privilege to read a sane viewpoint once a month after running into the religious slant permeated in my community. I am sure that I am not alone. My opinion may not matter much but I do not want you to give up on this important newsletter. If you have run out of things to write about, I believe that it would be a good opportunity to discuss other related issues.

The major problem is that BE is not exposed to the public enough, which limits its influence. I came upon your site on the Web almost by accident. Promotion takes money and participation to make happen. The religious community has become very good at spreading the "Good News." They do not have any qualms about asking for money and help. The material you have put out is superior to all others on the subject and most people do not have any idea that it exists. Even so, to get material out with which most people disagree requires a monumental effort as well as good strategies. I'm not rich but I want to help out. I will help with the video strategy. If you need any help with other projects I would like to contribute some of my time.

Editor's Response to Letter #795

Dear MB. Your willingness to assist is greatly appreciated, as are your kudos. Please contact me ASAP in regard to playing our video tapes. Rest assured I could never run out of material of which there is an abundance. I did, however, run low on other components.

Letter #796 from K Via Email

I am not a subscriber, but I wish I had been. Since I have cruised your website I have learned more about the bible and god than a life-time of being raised by a preacher for a father...and it saddens me to see and hear of the struggles you have had to keep BE going.... A friend sent me a link to your website, and though you will no longer have new entries, I do hope you will keep your site up and running, since I, along with others am still reading and learning all you...have to say about the bible and god.... Thank you so much for the work that you have done, and I hope to keep learning from you and your site in the future.

Letter #797 from RT via Email

It's a pleasure to have the opportunity to thank you for the profoundly beneficial work that you have accomplished. I was truly excited to find your web site while reading through the Errancy discussion group in Christianity Online. You and your work have fans everywhere!. My "recovery" experience is probably similar to other former fundamentalists, so I won't bore you with the by now all-too-familiar details. Suffice it to say that your efforts, in combination with others, have been "the lamp unto my feet" that led me out of the darkness of biblical superstition.... Again, my most heartfelt thanks.

Letter #798 from AN of Dallas, Oregon

Thank you for writing such a most needed book! I ordered your book through H. H. Waldo booksellers and it was definitely worth every penny. I am a former Pentecostal minister who has studied apologetics since I was 14 (now 27), but I found the grinding doubts, the anti-human teachings etc, to be too painful, and inherently evil. I'm just glad that I heard of your publication at an early age, so that I didn't inflict that poison on too many sincere people. I picked up my email address screen name, Job25:6, from your book. That's the verse where it calls the "son of man" a worm. I can't tell you how thankful I am for your Encyclopedia. As a former Pentecostal minister/intern trying to become a moralistic freethinker, your book has been pure Gold! Words cannot express it. Thank you. Your name will undoubtedly go down in history as one of the main heroes of a positive/moral humanism in much the same way as, if not surpassing, the greatness of Thomas Paine. I didn't know that your newsletter was still going, and I found out that you are (after 16 years) going to give it a rest. Well, understandable, but I want to thank you for having the courage to combat those crummy christian apologists, and for giving us regular good-natured humanists, some ammunition against their hellfire threats. You're appreciated. Thanks again.

Editor's Response to Letter #798

Dear AN. Thanks for your kind words and if my work turns out to be half as fruitful and influential as you portend, it will have been well worth the time, effort, and commitment.

Issue #191 November 1998, Editor: Dennis McKinsey

COMMENTARY

BE has often been described as a publication devoted to exposing biblical contradictions and, although we have noted several times that more than just contradictions are emphasized, the impression endures. For that reason we can think of no more appropriate manner in which to conclude our 16 years than by returning to the notebooks from which it all began and devoting the last two issues to a book-by-book, verse-by-verse sequential litany entailing some of the most obvious biblical conflicts in the KJV. In so far as my memory serves me well, we will try to avoid repeating problems previously discussed, although an occasional repetition is not only unavoidable but desirable. Although by no means exhaustive, the following list should be reasonably overwhelming and act as an excellent reference source when short and sweet is needed.

Genesis

Gen. 6:4 RSV ("The Nephilim were on the earth in those days") and Gen. 7:21 ("And all flesh died that moved upon the earth....") say there were Nephilim BEFORE the Flood and all life died in the Flood; yet 13:33 RSV ("And there we saw the Nephilim") says there were Nephilim AFTER the Flood.

8:22 ("While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease") versus 41:56 ("And the famine was over all the face of the earth and Joseph opened all the storehouses")

9:21 (Noah "drank of the wine, and was drunken") versus 6:9 ("Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations").

In 10:5 we read, "By these were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their land; every one after his tongue", versus 11:1 ("And the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech") and 11:6 ("And the Lord said, Behold, the people is one, and they all have one language").

According to 14:12 ("And they took Lot, Abram's brother's son") Lot is Abraham's nephew; yet, 14:16 ("And Abraham brought back all the goods, and also brought his brother Lot....") says he is his brother.

Lot said to a crowd in 19:8, "Behold now, I have two daughters which have not known man; let me, I pray you, bring them out unto you, and do ye to them as is good in your eyes...", even though 2 Peter 2:8 says Lot was a righteous man.

22:1 ("And it came to pass after these things that God did tempt Abraham....") versus James 1:13 ("For God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man")

God said to Abraham in 22:2, "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac...." when he had another son, Ishmael, according to 16:16 ("And Abram was fourscore and six years old, when Hagar bare Ishmael to Abram"), and Gal. 4:22 ("For it is written, that Abraham had two sons 11)

25:1 ("Abraham took a wife, and her name was Keturah") versus I Chron. 1:32 ("Now the sons of Keturah, Abraham's concubine")

Exodus

Moses' father-in-law was Reuel in (2:18 & 2:21), Jethro in Ex. 4:18 ("now Moses kept the flock of Jethro his father-in-law"), Raguel in Num. 10:29 ("...the son of Raguel, the Midianite, Moses' father in law"), and Hobab in Judges 4:11 ("Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab the father-in-law of Moses")

Ex. 20:15 ("Thou shalt not steal") versus Ex. 3:22 ("...and ye shall spoil the Egyptians")

15:3 ("The Lord is a man of war") versus Rom. 15:33 ("Now the God of peace be with you all"), 1 Cor. 14:33 ("For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace") and 2 Cor. 13:11 ("...and the God of peace and love shall be with you")

16:31 ("...and the taste of manna was like wafers made with honey") versus Num. 11:8 ("...and the taste of it<manna>was as the taste of fresh oil")

22:21 ("Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt") and 23:9 versus 23:31 ("And I will set thy bounds from the Red Sea even unto the sea of the Philistines...for I will deliver the inhabitants of the land into your hand; and thou shalt drive them out before thee")

25:8 ("And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them") versus Acts 7:48 ("Howbeit the most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands....")

Isa. 40:28 ("Hast thou not known? hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God...fainteth not, neither is weary?") versus 31:17 ("...for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed")

32:27 ("Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor") versus Matt. 26:52 ("...for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword") and Ex. 20:13 ("Thou shalt not kill")

Leviticus

24:21 ("...he that killeth a man, he shall be put to death") versus Ex. 20:13 ("Thou shalt not kill")

Numbers

3:39 ("All that were numbered of the Levites...were twenty and two thousand") versus 3:17 ("And these were the sons of Levi by their names; Gershon, and Kohath, and Merari"), combined with 3:21-22 ("Of Gershon...were seven thousand and five hundred"), 3:27-28 ("Of Kohath...were eight thousand and six hundred"), and 3:33-34 ("Of Merari...were six thousand and two hundred") which total 22,300, not 22,000.

14:25 RSV ("Now, since the Amalekites and the Canaanites dwell in the valleys....") versus 14:45 RSV ("Then the Amalekites and the Canaanites who dwelt in that hill country came down...")

18:23-24 ("But the Levites shall do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they shall bear their iniquity: it shall be a statute forever throughout your generations, that among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance.... Levites...among the children of Israel shall have no inheritance") versus Joshua 21:3 ("And the children of Israel gave unto the Levites out of their inheritance, at the commandment of the Lord, these cities and their suburbs")

23:21 ("He<God>hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither has he seen perverseness in Israel") versus Deut. 9:24 ("Ye have been rebellious against the Lord from the day that I knew you"), Neh. 9:16 ("But they and our fathers dealt proudly, and hardened their necks, and hearkened not to thy commandments"), Num. 14:10-12, 11:1, 21:5-6, Ex. 32:7-12, and many other verses.

16:32-33 ("And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods. They and all that appertained to them, went down alive into the pit and the earth closed upon them: and they perished from among the congregation") versus 26:11 ("Notwithstanding the children of Korah died not")

26:38 ("The sons of Benjamin according to their respective clans were: Bela, Ashbek, Ahiram, Shephupham and Hupham") versus Gen. 46:21 ("And the sons of Benjamin were Belah, Becher, Ashbel, Gera, Naaman, Ehi, Rosh, Muppim, Huppim, and Ard")

30:2 ("If a man vow a vow unto the Lord, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond; he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth") versus Matt. 5:34-36 ("But I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven...nor by the earth...neither shalt thou swear by thy head")

Deuteronomy

2:7 ("For the Lord hath blessed thee...he knoweth thy walking through this great wilderness these forty years the Lord hath been with thee; thou hast lacked nothing") versus Ex. 16:2-3 ("And the whole congregation of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and Aaron in the wilderness. And the children of Israel said... Would to God we had died by the hand of the Lord in Egypt...when we did eat bread to the full; for ye have brought us forth into this wilderness, to kill this whole assembly with hunger") and Num. 11:5-6 ("We remember the fish we ate in Egypt for nothing...but now our strength is dried up, and there is nothing at all but this manna to look at")

6:16 ("Ye shall not tempt the Lord your God") versus Isa. 7:10-12 ("Moreover the Lord spake again unto Ahaz, saying, 'Ask thee a sign of the Lord thy God'....But Ahaz said, 'I will not ask, neither will I tempt the Lord.'")

10:19 ("Love ye therefore the stranger: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt") versus ("Ye shall not eat of any thing that dieth of itself: thou shalt give it unto the stranger...that he may eat of it") and 23:20 ("Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury")

Was Moses excluded from Canaan because of: un-belief (Num. 20:12), rebellion (Num 27:14), or trespass (Deut. 32:51)?

Joshua

1 Cor. 3:8 ("...and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour") versus 24:13 ("And I have given you a land for which ye did not labour, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them....")

20:35 ("And the Lord smote Benjamin before Israel: and the children of Israel destroyed of the Benjaminites that day 25,100: all these drew the sword") versus 20:46 ("So that all which fell that day of Benjamin were 25,000 men that drew the sword....")

According to 16:19 ("Saul sent messengers unto Jesse, and said, 'Send me David thy son, which is with the sheep'") Saul knew David; yet, 17:58 ("And Saul said unto him, 'Whose son art thou'...And David answered, 'I am the son of thy servant Jesse the Bethlehemite'") later shows he did not know David.

According to 15:35 RSV ("And Samuel did not see Saul again until the day of his death, but Samuel grieved over Saul...") Samuel and Saul did not meet until the day the latter died; yet, 19:24 ("And Saul stripped off his clothes, and he too prophesied before Samuel....") shows they did meet prior to Saul's death.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #799 from DS of Tiffin, Ohio

I have had this sinking feeling for sometime, that you, for what ever reason, were headed in a different direction.... Your decision must be a difficult one. I will miss BE, but you seemed to have moved on. Allow me to extend my thoughts on why some have "fallen, short of the glory."

I'm not sure if you are aware of local media (cable) and it's effects. Possibly in a larger market more leeway would be allowed, but I have tried to have both your tapes, and before that American Atheist programs, put on local cable. I did manage to get AA's on for three episodes till Continental Cable pulled the plug. They gave various excuses, but I knew the problem came from those who control the communities various social groups. Elk, Rotary, and Kiwanis, all of which the local manager belonged to, were "suggesting" that they (the shows) not be aired. So it was and still is tough sledding. I have managed over time to have eyes and ears, so I could see if and how anyone responded.... I know the opposition. I have felt it as have you. Recently, Media One has taken over, you know one of those mergers that would provide competition and lower rates. I thought I would ask again. After being phone tagged around and having meetings canceled, I got the message. I even offered to pay to have them on. No dice. Granted, there is nothing to fear, but there is also no place to which one can get the message out.

Others have this problem too. Lately, I have had none of my letters to the editor printed. I'm about ready to stand on the street corner and start wearing a sign that says: "The End is not coming!" The media, you know the...media, that controls our lives, is in the hands of very large and powerful organizations.... We, as a nation and as a world, will be divided up into two major classes, those who are useful and compliant to their wishes and those who are not. Religion really will be the opiate of the masses.... Religion will be given to the rest as a control device. Rome did it, why not do it again, but on a global scale?.... There is no reward in being right if no one cares about the truth. Talk about a voice crying in the wilderness. You have done great work and have pursued the path which few would follow. For your efforts I will always be grateful. Sometimes after an e-mail debate in which the person with whom one is discussing makes a contradiction in one paragraph which he can not even see, one starts to wonder what we are coming to. Then there's the ...fundamentalist preacher.... His tactic has been to identify and then get in or out, depending on whether or not you are a good candidate for contributing to his coffers. Every good salesman knows when to close or get out and find the next mark....

Another important point is that there is no central clearing house where freethinkers can exchange ideas.... I suggested a central clearing house over a decade ago. I still think a major problem is the lack of commitment and determination on the part of the anti-religious crowd. The fire in the belly is just not there among a sufficient number of people. Granted, obstacles are everywhere. But still, a lot more could be done by a whole lot of people that is not being accomplished.... I don't mean that we should have a "club" but at least a "phone book" or "directory" to which one can turn for information. Even an e-mail address book would be nice. But there is no such animal and as far as I can detect none in the making. There are directories, but, again, that does no good when our numbers remain small and uncommitted. We are hither and thither. We have no direction....

You know this better than anyone; there is no emotional need to have the truth. "My husband is in heaven with God," is a hard thing to contradict, and that is where we are the weakest. Truth has no emotional importance when a myth makes one feel good. Last year's addict is this year's born again. That's hard to compete with.... But when you combine that with almost total lack of media support, what is one to do? I can't afford a national broadcast.... How do you compete when they control the microphone and the off-button. Ever since 1987 when the "Fairness Doctrine" was removed, conservative owners and "celebs" don't have to offer equal time to any dissenting opinions. Ten years later we are seeing the effects of this policy. ABC has a Religion Editor, CBS has its Angels....all exclaiming the good news. The trend is clear. I will miss your good news every month.... I fear that the electronic highway will soon be cut down to size and only messages of an accepted "value" will get through. ...I was recently told by a radio "personality" that not believing in God just proves there is a God. Thousands of people listen to this drivel and nod yes. The best to you and yours and keep in touch.

Editor's Response to Letter #799

Thanks for your compliments. I sympathize with your observations and I, too, am very saddened by the end of BE and our opposition's control of the media.

Letter #800 from ERB of Illinois

I'm writing to thank you for the enormous research effort and scholarship that you put into your book, "The Encyclopedia of Biblical Errancy!" I read the work from cover to cover, more like I would a novel, than the way I usually utilize books that I purchase as reference materials.... It was that captivating to me! You are to be congratulated on creating such a well-organized and useful tool for us free-thinkers to use in our discussions with the zealots who confront us at work and play to spread their narrow and one-dimensional views! Thank you so very much. Your book made me aware of other valuable resources, such as Gerald Sigal's "The Jew and the Christian Missionary," which I also studied and enjoyed.... Are you still available to do radio talk shows as a telephone guest? If so, I would like to arrange for you to be heard on the radio station that I work for! WJBC-AM is the top-rated station here in our community and, while I am not personally on the air much anymore, I am quite sure that our 9 a.m. to Noon host, on weekdays....or our 6 a.m. to Noon host on Sunday mornings would be happy to interview you on-the-air in whatever style you might prefer.... At the very least, I could deliver you a huge radio audience for the promotion of your book and the information it contains.... It is something few of us in this very conservative Judeo-Christian fundamentalist Midwestern community have ever had the chance to hear! I was raised in the Church of Christ, but was never the blindly accepting child my parents wanted me to be! Every time I questioned anything about "God" or "the Bible," I was immediately chastised and instructed to accept everything as truth or face eternal damnation in "Hell"! Don't misunderstand me. My parents were wonderful people and I had a good childhood for the most part, but their religious views created a horrible fear of death in me that spoiled many years of my being able to just enjoy all the wonders and pleasures of life! I am 51 and only in the past several years have I been able to separate myself from their indoctrination, develop my own beliefs, and begin to live life as I wanted. Your book helped me do that!... I can't accept the masculine Jewish God of the Old Testament who supposedly fathered the "messiah," Jesus, with his earthly bride... nor can I accept the trinity, or any of that. I see "Mother Nature" in the beauty of a flower, for instance, but I also appreciate the abilities and talents of mortal men in their designs for automobiles and buildings, and all they have been able to accomplish in medicine, computers, communications, and science, using only the raw materials that have existed since whatever caused this universe to come into existence....

As for the afterlife, I am simply not going to worry about it any more! I really enjoyed your thoughts in this regard.... Would it really be "heaven" if I had to spend it with a bunch of people I couldn't spend 5 minutes with, let alone eternity? Do we escape death and enjoy eternal life by faith, grace, works, a combination of the three, or none of the above? I don't know and no longer care! All I really know for certain, is that my (expletive deleted--Ed.) detector has been buzzing at full volume for many years in regard to the "bible," and now I have a better understanding of "why." The "God" of the "bible" is a creation of man, not vice versa.... I would gladly work to further disseminate information of the type I discovered through your efforts. Too many have been, and continue to be, misled for too long.

Editor's Response to Letter #800

Dear ERB. Thanks for your support and willingness to spread the word, and we are always available for radio and TV talk shows. I would, however, recommend reconsideration of your belief that the universe came into existence and was caused" by something.

Letter #801 from LL Via the Internet

I was raised a Roman Catholic - very Catholic, was married in a church, and so on. We had a bible on our coffee table at all times. One day, while visiting my in-laws, I discovered that my father-in-law was an atheist. How could that be? I found a copy of BE in the magazine rack! I devoured it! Then, I devoured all of his back issues of BE! I then tore into whatever other publications he had on hand (I was pretty anti-social for the remainder of that visit!). When I got home, I did something that I, like so many other Christians, had never done - I cracked that book on the coffee table and actually began to READ it. My wife and I read the bible aloud EVERY NIGHT, and marveled with shock and dismay at the atrocities in the so-called "good" book. We didn't even make it through Judges before I knew that something was terribly wrong but not with my faith. I lost that near Ex. 4:24 (Zipporah was pretty quick with that stone, eh?...). There was something wrong with the millions of people who believed that (Expletive Deleted--Ed.)! So, I subscribed to BE and a few other publications. I started looking into other sources as well. I read Paine and Jefferson.... I watched "Inherit the Wind!" I picked up "The Layman's Parallel Bible," in Nashville, Tennessee, wearing a Charles Darwin tee-shirt and drew wicked stares from the cashier who was obligated to give me a free coffee mug for making such a large purchase! I, too, began the long task of combing the book and writing down all of my questions, problems, and objections. But even more importantly, I began TALKING ABOUT IT to others. I talked to my uncles, two born- again Christians who once believed that the world would end in the year 2000. I talked to my mother, who was still scarred from the humiliation of excommunication. I talked to a friend who was writing his final term paper for a religion class. The priest teaching the class filled the back of each page (and had to add two more) with his rebuttals! I talked to another friend, who was getting ready to send a letter to a TV network to protest a show he had never seen, just because of what Dobson said on "Focus on the Family." One person I talked to formed a bible study group just to answer my persistent challenges! All of these people have been exposed to BE. Did any of these people become atheists? No. Will they? Perhaps, because now, with literature like BE, they are now doing the things that so many Christians don't do - and the things that made me an atheist - they are READING the book that they hold in such high esteem and are THINKING while doing it! For me, BE is a tool. A very, very useful tool that I would use even if you doubled the subscription price!

Put me in the "keep the change" category. And be sure to expect some orders for back issues. If BE won't be published in the future, I'll just have to work my way through its history to get my monthly "fix!"

Letter #802 from SS Via Email

You'll recall perhaps that I wrote you earlier. Got your book. WONDERFUL. Not only is it chocked full of information, it is EXTREMELY well written. What in the heck do you do for a living? I wish half the college textbooks I used as an undergrad had been that well drafted. Tight prose, good arguments. Given all the interest in Biblical controversies generated by The Jesus Seminar and Spong's book, I would think Prometheus would try to market your book in a more mainstream fashion (zippy dust cover, etc.). Maybe it's too controversial? If you ever come out with a briefer, cheaper, paperback version, let me know. I'd like to buy copies for my friends. If I hit the lottery, I'll buy a hundred copies. Again, great job.

Editor's Note: We would like to thank all those subscribers who have sent us "Keep the Change" letters because, among other considerations, that will reduce the amount of paperwork required to close all accounts. Those who chose otherwise will receive a refund check attached to next month's final issue.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter #803 from LR from Oregon

Things have been a bit rocky this past week or so... The Public Access TV equipment suddenly started "acting up." The Public Access equipment would not work on Mondays or Thursdays, (the days I view our tapes), but would work at all other times. This unexplainable phenomenon had everyone here puzzled. The fact that the equipment would fail on only the days that I wanted to show our tapes, but would suddenly "repair" itself on all other occasions is, we all decided, proof of demons, and anybody who would deny that demons are at work here, is in denial of the facts! How else could you explain such an extra- ordinary happening? I told the local manager of the Cable service that I intended to talk to the City Attorney and the City Manager in hopes of getting city funding to hire an exorcist, with a rank of no less than Bishop, to expel the demons. The mere mention of the City Attorney was enough to clear up the problem almost that very day! Twas truly a miracle, as anyone can plainly see! Because of these extraordinary and unbelievable interruptions, obviously caused by "things not seen, nor known by man," I'm about two weeks behind. Will be starting tape #12 this coming Monday, demons permitting, and hope to be back on schedule....

I called a local religious radio program and asked them if they knew anything about the "terrible slanderous things being said about the beloved and inerrant Bible" on the Public Access Channel and learned that the local clergy are going to start a "refutation hour." ...You will be happy to know, that in this little town...I have 13 pastors, ministers, preachers, priest (one), deacons, and deaconesses ...copying your tapes in order that a proper and complete refutation can be made of all the "things taken out of context."

I am absolutely having a ball!..... I suspect that things are going to heat up considerably in the coming months... I hope you can keep the tapes coming!... I LOVE IT! ...Cheers and Hugs!

Letter #804 from JK of Honolulu, Hawaii

I have only recently discovered and begun studying your periodical.... It is truly a noble endeavor, and quite courageous, to openly criticize the central tome of a religion followed by virtually all of this nation's political leaders.... Your publication, to me, represents the epitome of first amendment freedom of expression. For that alone, you should be very proud.

I was raised an Episcopalian and attended Sunday school where I dutifully memorized songs about the sanctity of the Bible.... Although I was never devout, it never occurred to me to question this book until college.... Your periodical helped me clarify what bothered me so much about "Bible- thumping" -&endash; it's essentially the worship of a book in which critical thought is strictly forbidden.

I am writing to you now in response to some of your Closure remarks in the June Issue No. 186. The tone of your comments struck me as fatalist, even apocalyptic. I sincerely hope you believe, as I do, that your work will continue to reach and influence people all over the world, even after 1998. Remember that your periodical flourished for nearly two decades in a predominantly Christian nation. Through the web, it can continue to open minds and encourage honest, critical thought (as it did for me). "Biblical Errancy" can continue to educate far beyond its mere regularity.

I looked at BE on the web and I saw that you are discontinuing the publication. I understand your argument, and I don't take issue with your reasoning. I believe you are correct that unbelievers, for the most part, are unwilling to become activists for unbelief. However, I wanted to express my opinion to you, that your writings have a great deal of influence that is hidden from you -- influence that occurs when a believer quietly and covertly takes a look at your web pages, and influence that happens when an unbeliever uses your material in private conversations with believers, conversations that will never be repeated by either of them to anyone else because of their intimacy. The critical mass needed for a sweeping renunciation of Christian superstition by our society does not exist at this time in our history. Regrettable as this may be, there is definitely a quiet, almost invisible, undercurrent of skepticism which is being fueled by solitary and one-on-one use of your material, and other material like it.... I personally use your material, and other material like it, with believers whenever I have the opportunity. As a consequence, my rational unbelief has become widely known through whispered conversations and prayer requests among my relatives and their believing friends. Without material such as yours, they could easily dismiss my unbelief, but because of the existence of your material they have been left dumbfounded and confused, and very likely doubting, although they would never let me know this. I have become a constant and tangible reminder to them that their faith may indeed be groundless. I do not believe that I am an isolated case. I believe many new unbelievers are finding material like yours on the internet and using it the same way I'm using it. Don't misunderstand me. I'm not trying to convince you to go on with a project that will not meet your declared criteria for success. I'm simply remarking on something that you undoubtedly already know, but perhaps don't remind yourself of very often, namely, that much of the influence that your work has is ongoing, but quiet, and nearly invisible because it happens in corners through solitary browsing of the internet or in one-on-one interactions. Personally, I believe this kind of influence will prove the strongest, since fundamentalists and evangelicals, who are rather impervious to reason when it is presented by untrusted heathen, will often listen to a trusted friend or relative in a private setting. By no means is your work all for naught. It only seems to me that its influence is strongest in ways which you were not explicitly aiming for. If its flame hasn't swept the country, it is only because the tinder is wet, not because the match isn't hot. Since I hold different criteria for success than you do, I consider your work an unqualified success. I hope that you will not be unduly discouraged with the fruit of your own labor simply because current popular sentiment causes society to be relatively unswayed by vital issues.

SOME FINAL WORDS

Well. We have come to the end of a long journey, a long journey, indeed. To say that it has been an enterprise well worth the effort is an understatement of the first magnitude. Not only do I feel a tremendous amount of enlightenment with respect to Scripture has been brought to thousands of people but from a purely personal standpoint I have not only increased my knowledge of the Bible's failings but honed my writing skills by a sizable factor. Our readers have ranged all the way from vociferous critics to staunch supporters, and I have welcomed the presence of each and every one. Without their letters, even those of a critical nature, we could never have highlighted so many issues so clearly. Over the years we have managed to create a vast body of knowledge with regard to Scripture that should be of tremendous value to untold numbers of people now living and yet to come. Hopefully they will be able to use it as effectively as have many of our subscribers. We have not discussed all of the inadequacies of Scripture because that would require many volumes and more time than I have available, but we have certainly accumulated far more than enough information to persuade any reasonably intelligent and fairly objective observer that the Bible is anything but the inerrant word of a perfect being.

We would be remiss were we not to offer a final word of gratitude to all those who have gone out of their way to aid us in oh so many ways, especially in regard to finances, time, research, playing video tapes, media interviews, TV recording sessions, and distribution of our tapes and materials. Without all of this selfless devotion to the cause, our efforts would have been considerably less successful. One of the most enjoyable by-products of this undertaking over the years has been that I have come to know a great many fine people on a purely personal level, people who sincerely seek the truth and care about the deleterious influence of religion in general and the Bible in particular on their fellow man. And I can say without reservation that I have never met a more decent community of admirable individuals. The assertion by many religionists that you must believe in some kind of supreme being or divinely-sanctioned holy book in order to be moral, honest, conscientious, humane, and fair is unable to withstand scrutiny and decidedly at odds with reality. Far too much data exists to the contrary. In fact, all too often the opposite is true.

Two of the most prominent newscasters in American history were Edward R. Murrow and Walter Cronkite. The former nearly always ended his programs by saying, "Good bye and Good luck," while the favorite closing remark of the latter was, "That's the way it is." With the inordinant and deleterious influence exercised by the Bible upon society being what it is, I can think of no more fitting final statement with which to conclude our sixteen years than by combining & paraphrasing the words of both to say, "Good bye and good luck, because, although that's the way it is, it need not be."
